TO THE RIGHT REVEREND FATHER IN GOD MY LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBVRIE, PRIMATE AND METROPOLITANE OF AL ENGLAND, AND ONE OF her Maiesties most honorable priuie Councell, IOHN STOVV wisheth increase as well of all heauenly graces, as worldly blessings.

TIS NOW NIGH FORTY yeeres (Right reuerend Father) since I first addressed al my cares and cogitations to the studie of Histories and search of Antiquities: the greatest part of which time I haue diligently imploied in collecting such matters of this kingdome, as I thought most woorthie to be recommended both to the present and succeeding age. These laborious collections in so long a time haue now at length grown into a large volume, which I was willing to haue committed to the presse, had not the Printer, for some priuate respects, been more desirous to publish Annales at this present. Wherein I haue condescended to him to publish these, which I submit to your gratious and graue consideration, and to the censure of the courteous Reader and learned Antiquaries: relying wholy vpon this comfort, that the truth and credit of my Authors is in no point iniuried, how simple and naked soeuer the stile may be iudged. Neither doe I doubt but they may haue free passage in the world, if they be countenanced vnder your honorable name and protection. Vnto whom I offer, and with al dutifull affection I dedicate both my ſelfe and them: being hereunto induced, both for that your woorthy predeceſſor, and my eſpeciall benefactor Archbiſhop PARKER animated me in the courſe of theſe ſtudies, which otherwiſe I had long ſince diſcontinued; and alſo that your great loue and entire affection to all good letters in generall, and to the Antiquities in particular hath beene ſo ſingular, that all which like and loue good ſtudies, doe iuſtly eſteeme you their principall and gratious patrone.

Thus hoping of your fauourable acceptance of this, as but part of that which I intended in a more large volume, I humbly take my leaue.

London this 24. of Nouember 1600.

To the gentle Reader.

Amongst other Bookes which are in this our learned age published in great numbers, there are few, either for the honestie of the matter, or commoditie which they bring to the Commonwealth, or for the pleasantnes of the study & reading, to be preferred before the Chronicles and Histories. What examples of men deseruing immortalitie, of exploites woorthy great renowne, of vertuous liuing of the posteritie to be imbraced, of wise handling of weightie affaires, diligently to be marked and aptly to bee applied: what incouragement of Nobilitie to noble feates, what discouragement of vnnaturall subiects from wicked treasons, pernitious rebellions and damnable doctrines: to conclude, what perswasion to honestie, godlines and vertue of all sorts, what dissuasion from the contrarie is not plentifully in them to bee found? So that it is as hard a matter for the Readers of Chronicles, in my fansie, to passe without some colours of wisedome, inuitements to vertue, and loathing of naughty facts, as it is for a well fauoured man to walke vp and downe in the hote parching sunne, and not to be therewith sun-burned. They therefore which with long studie, earnest good will, and to their great costs and charges haue brought hidden Histories from duskie darkenesse to the sight of the world, and haue beene diligent obseruers of Commonwealths, and noted for the posteritie the fleeting maners of the people, and accidents of the times: deserue (as the least) thankes for their paines, and to be misreported of none, seeing they haue laboured for all. I write not this to complaine of some mens ingratitude towardes me (although iustly I might) but to shew the commodities which ensue of the reading of Histories, that seeing they are so great and so many, all men would (as they ought) imploy their diligence in the honest, fruitfull, and delectable perusing of the same, and so to account of the Authors, as of men carefull for their Countrie: and to confesse, if neede require, by whome they haue taken profite.

Note that the vngrateful backbiter slayeth three at once, himselfe by his owne malice, him that credideth his false tales, and him that he backbiteth.

It is nowe nigh forty yeeres since (I seeing the confuse order of our late English Chronicles, and the ignorant handling of ancient affaires) leauing mine owne peculiar gaines, consecrated my selfe to the search of our famous Antiquities. What I haue done in them before time, the former editions of my Summarie, and other my Chronicles, as also of other mens, wherein I haue bestowed no small labours, may well testifie, but how farre (be it spoken without arrogancie) I haue laboured for the truth more than some other, this last edition (an abstract of a farre larger worke which I haue gathered, and meant to haue published) will euidently declare. Wherein, that I differ from the inordinate and vnskilfull collections of other men, it is no maruell, seeing that I do not fully agree with my selfe, as some malicious persons haue fondly charged me: but let it be considered, that there is nothing perfect at the first, and that it is incident to mankinde to erre and slippe some times, but onely the point of fantastic all fooles, to perseuer and continue in their errors. Wherefore, seeing that the perusing of ancient Records and best approoued Histories of all times (not without great difficultie obtained) doe not onely moone me, but for their authority driue me to acknowledge both mine and other mens errors, and in acknowledging to correct them, I trust to obtaine thus much at your hands, that at the least you will call to remembrance a most gentle and wise lawe of the politike Persians, wherein it was enacted, that a man accused to be in their lawes a trespasser, and found guilty of the crime, should not straightway be condemned, but after a diligent inquirie and search of his whole life and conuersation (no slaunder imputed vnto him as of importance) if the number of his laudable facts did counteruaile the contrarie, he was full quit of the trespasse. The same law doe I wish the Readers of these my Chronicles to put in vre, that if the errors be not so plentifull, as Histories truly alleadged, they will beare with them: for as I promised, so haue I tried all matters woorthy of immortalitie, by the certaine touchstone of best allowed Historiographers: and yet notwithstanding, some faults by misprinting haue escaped the correction, which easily may be seene and amended by the diligent Reader.

BRITISH MUSEUM 3 DE 91

A BRIEFE DESCRIPTION OF ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, WALES, AND CORNWALL.

BRITAINE, or Brutanne which by two names is called England and Scotland, is an Iland in the Ocean Sea, situate right ouer against France: one part of which Ile Englishmen do inhabit, another part Scots, the third part Walshmen, and the fourth part Cornishmen. All they either in language, conditions, or lawes, doe differ among themselues.

England (so called of Englishmen, which did winne the same) is the greatest part, and is diuided into xl. Counties, which wee call Shires: whereof tenne (that is to say) Kent, Sussex, Surrey, Southampton, Barkshire, Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Deuonshire and Cornwall, doe containe the first part of that Iland: which part bounding toward the South, standeth betweene the Thames and the Sea. Fourtie Counties or Shires.

From thence to the riuer of Trent, which passeth through the middest of England be sirtæne shires, whereof the first sire (standing Eastward) are Essex, Middlesex, Hartfordshire, Suffolke, Northfolke, and Cambridge shire: the other ten which stand more in the middle of the Country are these: Bedforde, Huntingdon, Buckingham, Oxford, Northampton, Rutland, Leicester, Nottingham, Warwicke, & Lincolne. After these there be sire which border Westward vpon Wales, as Gloucester, Hereford, Worcester, Shropshire, Stafford, Chester, & Monmouth. About the middle of the Region lie Darbishire, Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Cumberland. On the left hand toward the West is Westmerland. Against the same is the Bishopricke of Durham, & Northumberland, which boundeth vpon the North in the Marches of Scotland.

These shires be diuided into xvii. Bishoprickes, which by a Greeke worde, be called Dioceses. Of which Dioceses, Canterburie hath Kent. Rochester hath part of Kent. London hath Essex, Middlesex, and part of Hartford. Chichester hath Sussex. Winchester hath Hampshire, Surrey, & the Ile of Wight. Salisburie hath Barkeshire, and Wiltshire. Exceter hath Deuonshire and Cornwall. Bathe and Wels hath Somersetshire. Worcester hath Worcestershire, and part of Warwickshire. Gloucester hath Gloucestershire. Hereford hath part of Shropshire, and Herefordshire. Couentrie and Lichfield hath Staffordshire, Darbishire, part of Warwickshire, & part of Shropshire. Lincolne which is the greatest, lying betweene the Thames and Humbre, hath Lincolne, Leycester, Huntington, Bedford, Buckingham, and the residue of Hartfordshire. Ely hath Cantabridgeshire, and the Isle of Ely. Norwich hath Suffolke and Norfolke, and part of Cantabridgeshire. Oxford hath Oxfordshire. Peterborow hath Northamptonshire and Rutland. Bristowe hath Dorsetshire. And this is the province of the Archbishop of Canterburie, which is the Primate of all England, with Wales. The Archbishop of Yorke, hath Yorkeshire, Nottinghamshire, and a peece of Lancashire. The Bishop of Durham hath the Bishoprieke so commonly called, and Northumberland. Chester hath Cheshire, most part of Lancashire, Richmonde, part of Flintshire, and part of Denbighshire. Carlile containeth Cumberland and Westmerland: and this is the other Province of the Archbishop of Yorke, which is another Primate of England, & was of long time also Primate of all Scotland: but these Dioceses take their names of the Cities where those Seas bee placed, the chiefe whereof, is London, where in the beginning was the Archbishops Sea, but afterwardes transposed to Canterbury, a citie in Kent, placed in a soile amiable and pleasant.

The Riuer of Thamis.

London standeth in Middlesex, on the North side of the Thames. That most excellent and goodlie Riuer hath first the name of Isse, and beginneth in Cotteswolde in Glocestershire, about a mile from Cirbery, and as much from the hie way called Fosse: and it taketh first the name of Tamise, nere to Dorcester bridge, where the Riuer Tame and the foresaid Isse meete, and so with a marueilous quiet course it passeth by London, and then breaketh into the French Ocean by maine tydes, which twise in foure and twentie houres space doth ebbe and flowe more then threescore miles, to the great commoditie of trauellers, by which all kindes of Marchandise be easily conueied to London, the principall store and staple for all commodities within this Realme. Upon the same Riuer is placed a stone bridge, a worke verie rare and marueilous, which bridge hath (reckoning the draw bridge) twentie arches made of foure square stone, of height threescore foote, and of breadth thirty foote, distant one from another twentie foote, compact and ioined together with vaults & cellers. Upon both sides be houses builded, y it seemes rather a continual street then a bridge.

The Ocean sea doeth bound England, the first part of Brytaine, East and South, Wales & Cornwall West. The Riuer of Twede diuideth England and Scotland, North. The length of the Iland beginneth at Portsmouth in the South part, and endeth at Twede in the North, containing 320. miles.

This Realme aboue other is most fruitefull on this side Humbre: for beyond it is fuller of mountaines. And although to the beholders of that Countrey a farre off, it maie seeme plaine, yet it is full of manie hilles, and those for the most part voide of trees, the valleis whereof bee verie delectable, inhabited for the most part by noble men, who according to ancient and olde order, desire not to dwell in Cities, but neere vnto valleis and riuers in seuerall villages, for auoiding of vehement windes, because that Iland naturally is stormie.

The Riuer of Humber.

Humbre hath his beginning a little on this side Yorke, and by and by runneth Southward, and then holdeth his course Eastward, and so into the maine sea, greatly encreased by the riuers of Dune and Trent.

Trent

Trent beginneth a little from Stafford, running through Darbishire, and Leicestershire, passing by Lichfield and Nottingham on the right hawe, and Dane on the left hand: so that both those Riuers doe make an Ilande which is called Auholme, and then ioyning together on this side Kingstone vpon Hull, a goodly marchant towne, they fall into Humbre: by which Riuer they may arriue out of France, Germanie and Denmarke. The Riuer of Trent.

England is fruitfull of beasts, and aboundeth with cattell: whereby the inhabitants be rather for the most part graziers then plowmen, because they giue themselues more to feeding, then to tillage. So that almost the third part of the Countrey is employed to cattell, Deere red and fallowe, Goates, (whereof there be store in the North parts) and Conies: for euerie where there is iolly maintenance of those kindes of beasts, because it is full of great woods: whereof there riseth pastime of hunting, greatly exercised, specially by the Nobility and Gentlemen. (Andrew Bourd saith, there be moe Parkes in England then in all Europe beside.) Andrew Bourd.

Scotland another part of Britaine, (whereof in this place I haue thought good to treat at large, that no further mention of the situation thereof might be made hereafter) beganne sometime at the hill called Grampius, nowe called Grantesbeine stretching to the furthest coast Northward, but after the ouerthrowe of the Picts, it beganne at the Riuer Twede, and sometimes at the Riuer of Tyne, the fortune of warres altering the same, as it doeth all other thinges. Therefore the length of Scotland from Twede to the furthest coast, is esteemed to be 480. miles: but as Scotland is longer then England, so it is narrowe, and endeth like a wedge. For the mountaine Grampius is euill fauoured and craggie, which Tacitus in the life of Iulius Agricola doth remember, pearcing through the bowels of Scotland, from the coast of the Germaine sea, that is to say, from the mouth of the Riuer of Dee to the Irish sea, euen to the lake of Lomunde, which lieth betweene that countrey and the same hill. Scotland. Cornelius Tacitus.

The Riuer of Twede (which springeth out of a little hill, not farre beyonde Norborough) is mingled with the Germaine Ocean, ioyning Southwarde with that countrey which is called the Marches, being the East boundes betweene England and Scotland. The saide Riuer of Twede separateth the Marches from Northumberland, the furthest Countrey of England, hauing prospect to the Germaine sea, the chiefe towne whereof is Barwike, nowe in possession of the English.

The Westerne limit of Scotland whilom was Cumberland, which the Riuer of Solue diuideth from Annandale. Betweene these two Regions the Cheuiot hilles appeare. Next to the Marches Pictland bordereth, nowe termed Loughdean, bounding vpon the East, a verie hillie Countrey, barreine almost of anie trees. The most famous townes of the same bee Dunbarre, Hadington, Leith, Northberwicke, and Edenborough the Kinges seate, where also is the Castell of Maydens, a verie strong and defensible place. The same citie the riuer of Forthea (commonly called the Frith) doth water & passe by: which being caried into the Germane Ocean, maketh great armes or meres, commonly called the Scottish sea: wherein besides other is the Ilande of Saint Columbe, by name called Aemonia. The ſame riuer againe deuideth from Loughdeam a countrey adioyning (abundant of all thinges) called the Fife, in which country are many townes, as Donfermile, Cupre, but the notable towne of Saint Andrew, ſpecially famous for the Vniuerſitie, and beautified with the Sea of the Archbiſhop and Primate of all Scotland. On the other ſide towardes the Iriſh ſide Northward, is Nidiſdalia, ſo called of the Riuer that palleth thereby, where be the ſtrong townes of Douglaſſe and Donfrieſe.

Upon the South adioyneth Galloway, more abounda[n]t of fodder for Cattel, then of Wheate, where is the Towne of Candida Caſa, nowe called Whitherne, and the ancient Temple of ſaint Ninian, adorned alſo with an Epiſcopal Sea. In thoſe partes beſides the towne of Wighton is a lake of a wonderfull nature, becauſe the one ſide in Winter doth freeſe, and the other not. By that ſtandeth the countrey of Caricta, once renowmed with the Towne Caricton, whereof perchance it toke the name. Aboue Caricta towardes the Weſt, is Elgonia (by which name Ptoleme calleth the countrey) bordering vpon the Ocean, wherein is the lake Lomunde, which is verie broad and large, containing manie Ilands, ſituate at the foote of the mountaine Granteſbeine, eight miles from the caſtell of Donbryton, beſides the riuer Bodotria, nowe named Leuinus, entring into the Riuer of Glota or Glude. Here ſome do contend that the name of Bodotria is not well applied to Leuinus, becauſe it appeareth by Cornelius Tacitus, that Bodotria and Glota haue ſundry paſſages into the ſea, and are clearely diſtempt one from the other, as Leuinus and Glota are not: wherefore they iudge rather the Riuer now called the Frith to be that which of old time had to name Bodotria, and to proue the ſame they adde many other reaſons, which here I omit. But a good ſpace on this ſide Grampius riſeth the Riuer of Taus, the greateſt in all Scotland, taking his name of a lake from whence it ſpringeth, which falleth by Atholia and Calidonia by manie places, but chiefely by Perthum now called Saint Johns towne, and laſtly by Dunde, in time paſt called Alectum, and there breaketh into the German ſea, and at the mouth forceth great eſtuars or armes of the ſea, whereof Tacitus maketh mention. Againſt Taus is Anguiſe, which by meanes of that riuer is fertile and proſperous, and is deuided from Fife.

To the ſame vpon the North adioyneth Athol, not the barreneſt countrey, as well for water as for plentie of ſoile. On the other ſide Arguile ſheweth it ſelfe, which being full of lakes, yeeldeth greater plentie of fodder then fruite, whoſe vttermoſt bounds ſtretch ſo farre, as Ireland is not diſtant paſt ſixteene miles, about which the promontorie or foreland called Lands head ſtandeth. That coaſt whilome the Silures did inhabite, as Polidor gathereth by theſe wordes of Plinie in his 4. booke, the 16. chapter.

Ireland being ſituate ouer againſt Britaine, is diſtant from the nation of Silures by the ſhorteſt cut twentie miles. Howbeit, ſome other, for that it is manifeſt by the ſame Plinie in the ſame Chapter, and alſo by other writers, that Britaine was not in his time well knowne ſo farre North, ſuppoſe hee meant not by this, that the Silures ſhould inhabite Arguile, but rather South-

Wales,

Wales, from whence the passage ouer was better knowen (and as hee might haue vnderstanding) shortest. Where also as well Tacitus as Antoninus séeme to place that people.

Betweene Argile and Leniox Westward lieth the Countrey of Sterling, so called by a towne there. Here the forrest of Calidonia began on the left side, which within stretcheth farre and broad. This forrest sometimes bredde white Bulles, long maned like Lyons, which were so wilde as they could not bee tamed, but because the flesh was pleasant and daintie to the mouth, the whole race of them almost is extinguished. There likewise is the Castle of Calydone, situate by Taus called Moucheldine. From a little hill of the forrest riseth Glota, or Cluid, which by a broad channell falleth into the Irish Ocean, for slayed in a manner by the bankes of the mountaine Grampius, it slideth into the Sea by great tides, so (as witnesseth Tacitus) the Romanes thought it to be another Iland. Of that riuer the Dale was called Gloteuale, which Countrey that Riuer runneth by: and in the same is the Citie of Glasco, a goodlie Vniuersitie.

Againe towardes the East is ioyned the Countrey of Anguish and Merne vpon the Sea coast, wherein Fordune by situation is verie strong, and for the reliques of S. Palladius the Scottish Apostle, famous.

Of the same side of Scotland, is the Countrey of Marre, garnished with a Citie called Aberdone, standing betweene the two riuers of Dona and Dea, with a Schole also adorned. Then followeth Morrey, which the two notable Riuers doe compasse about, called Nessa and Spea. At the mouth of this last Riuer, standeth the Towne of Elgin, about the banks whereof be huge woods replenished with all sortes of wilde beastes. There is a Lake also called Spina, stored with plentie of Swannes: but in the middle part standeth the broade Country of Rossia, now called Beane Rozen, stretching to the vttermost angle euen to both the Seas, and the further it goeth Eastward, the better it is inhabited. In the same is a bosome of the Sea, now and then so conuenient for Sailers, as commonly it is called the port of Health, (or the Hauen of Safety) and the towne Thana. The breadth of the Iland is verie short, for falling into the forme of a wedge, it is scant xxx. mile ouer, which defended with three promontories like towers, repelleth the great waues and surges of the Sea: and inuironed with two gulfes, which those promontories doe inclose, the entries be quiet and calme, and the water peaceable. The straite of that land is at this day called Cathanes, coasting vpon the Sea Deucalidon.

Thus much of the particulars of Scotland. But the same is in euerie place full of good Hauens and nauigable entries, Lakes, with Marshes, flouds, fountaines, verie full of fish, and mountaines, vpon the tops whereof be pleasant plaines, yéelding great store of grasse, and plentie of fodder for Cattell, woods likewise full of wilde beastes. That part of the land is well sustained with commodities, and therfore the people hard to be vanquished at any time, by reason the woods and Marshes be at hand for refuge, and hunger eased with venison and fish. Without Scotland in the Irish Seas, are manie Ilands nowe discouered, to the number of one hundred and fourtie: some of these in length are thirtie miles, but in breadth not aboue twelue. Amongſt them is Iona beautified with the Tombes of the Scottiſh kings. The Ilanders generally ſpeake Iriſh, which declareth them to take their originall of the Iriſh nation. Beyond Scotland toward the North, be the Iſles of Orchades, which (as Ptolomie ſaieth) bee threeſcore in number, ſome lying in the Deucalidon Sea, and ſome in the Germane Ocean, the principall of which Ilandes is Pamonia, becauſe it is a Biſhoppes Sea, and is vnder the gouernement of Scotland. The Ilanders vſe the Gothes ſpéech, which argueth them to procéede from the Germanes. They be tall of ſtature, but verie healthie and luſtie of bodie and minde, liuing verie long, although their chiefeſt foode is fiſh, for the land almoſt continually beſet with cold, in many places is not able to beare corne, and generally almoſt without trée or buſh. Beyond the Orchades be the Ilandes of Scotland, vnder the king of Scots obedience, and beyond thoſe ſtandeth Thule, in the froſen ſea now called Iſeland, to which our marchants repaire for fiſhing once euerie yeare in the Summer. And thus much haue I to ſaie of the ſite of Scotland: now of the nature and manners of the people.

The Scots which inhabite in the Southerne part, be well nurtured, and liue in good ciuilitie, and the moſt ciuill vſe the Engliſh ſpéech. And for that wood there is geaſon and ſcant, their common fewell is of a blacke ſtone, which they dig out of the earth. The other part Northerne, and full of mountaines, a verie rude and homely kinde of people doth inhabite, which are called the Redſhankes or wilde Scots. They be clothed with a mantell and ſhirte ſaffroned after the Iriſh maner, going bare legged to the knée. Their weapons are bowes and dartes, with a verie broad ſword and a dagger, ſharpe only at the one ſide. All ſpeake Iriſh, féeding on fiſh, milke, chéeſe, and fleſh, hauing a great number of Cattell. The Scots differ from the Engliſh in lawes and cuſtomes, becauſe they vſe the ciuill lawe as almoſt other Countries doe. The Engliſh haue their owne lawes and edicts. In certaine other conditions they be not farre vnlike, but their language is one, their habite and complexion like, one courage in battel, and in the Nobilitie one deſire & pregnancie in hunting. The Countrey houſes bee narrowe, couered with ſtrawe and réede, wherein the people and beaſtes doe lodge together. Their Townes beſides Saint Johns Towne are vnwalled, which is to be aſcribed to their animoſitie and hardineſſe, fixing all their ſuccour and helpe alwaie in the valiancie of their bodie. The Scottes are verie wiſe, as their learning declareth. For to whatſoeuer Art they do applie themſelues, they eaſily profite in the ſame. But the idle and ſlouthful, and ſuch chiefly as ſhun and auoide labour, liue in great pouerty, and yet will not ſticke to boaſt of their nobilitie & gentrie, as though it were more ſéemely for the honeſt to lacke, then comely (by exerciſe of ſome honeſt Arte) to get their liuing. But the Scots generally be deuoute obſeruers of Religion. And thus much of Scotland.

Wales. Wales the third part of Britaine lieth vppon the lefte hand, which like a Promontorie or foreland, or an Iſle (as it were) on euerie ſide is compaſſed with the maine ſea, except it be on the Southeaſt part with the Riuer of Sabrine, byne, commonly called Seuerne, which deuideth Wales from Englande, although some late writers affirme Hereford to be a bound betweene Wales and England, and say, that Wales beginneth at Chepstowe, where the Riuer Wey (augmented with an other Riuer called Lugge) passing by Herefordе, doth runne into the sea, which Riuer riseth in the middle of Wales out of that hill (but vncertaine whether out of that spring that Sabrine doth,) for euen to that place there goeth a great arme of the sea, which passing through the land westward, on the right hand leaueth Cornewall, and on the left Wales: which Topographie or description, although it bee newe, yet I thought good to followe. Therefore Wales is extended from the Towne of Chepstowe, where it beginneth almost by a straight line a little aboue Shrowsburie, euen to Westchester Northward. Into that part, so manie of the Brytaines as remained aliue after the slaughter and losse of their Countrey, at the length being driuen to their shiftes, did repaire, as ancient writings report, where partly through refuge of the mountaines, and partlie of the woods and marishes, they remained in safetie: which part they enioy euen to this daie. That land afterwards the Englishmen did call Wales: and the Brytaines the inhabitantes of the same, Walchmen: for amongst the Germains, Walchman, signifieth a stranger, an alien, an outborne or strange man, that is, such a one, as hath a contrarie language from theirs, for Wal in their tongue is called a stranger borne, as an Italian or Frenchman, which differ in speech from the Germaine. Man signifieth Homo, which is a man in English. Therefore Englishmen, a people of Germanie, after they had wonne Brytaine, called the Brytaines, which escaped after the destruction of their Countrey, after their Countrey manner, Walchmen, because they had another tongue or speech besides theirs: and the lande which they inhabited Wales, which name afterward both to the people and Countrey did remaine. By this meane the Brytaines with their kingdome lost their name. But they which affirme that name to be deriued of their King or Quéene, without doubt be deceiued. The Country soile towards the sea coast, and in other places in the valleis and plaines, is most fertile, which yéldeth both to man and beast great plentie of fruite and grasse: but in other places for the most part it is barraine and lesse fruitfull, because it lacketh tillage: for which cause husbandmen doe liue hardly, eating Oaten cakes, and drinking milke mixt with water. There be many Towns and strong Castles, and foure Bishoprickes, if the Bishopricke of Hereford bee counted in England, as the late Writers declare. The first Bishopricke is Meneue, so called of Meneua, which at this day they call Saint Dauids, a Citie verie auncient, situated vpon the sea coast, and boundeth Westward toward Ireland. Another is Landaffe, the third Bangor, and the fourth Saint Asaph, which bee vnder the Archbishop of Canterburie. The Walchmen haue a language from the Englishmen, which (as the saie that fetch their pedegrée from the Troians) doth partly sounde of the Troian antiquitie, and partly of the Grécke. But howsoeuer it is, the Walchmen do not pronounce their speech so pleasantly and gently as the Englishmen do, because they speake more in the throate: and contrariwise, the Englishmen rightly following lowing the Latines, doe expresse their voice somewhat within the lips, which to the hearers séemeth pleasant and swéete. And thus much of Wales, the third part of Brytaine.

Cornwall. Now followeth the fourth and last part of Brytaine named Cornwall. This part beginneth on that side which standeth toward Spaine Westward: Toward the East, it is of bredth fourescore and ten miles, extending a little beyond S. Germains, which is a verie famous village, situate on the right hand vpon the Sea coast, where the greatest bredth of that Countrey is but twenty miles: for this parcell of land on the right hand is compassed with the coast of the maine Sea: and on the left hand with that arme of the Sea, which (as before is declared) parteth the land, and runneth vp to Chepstow, where the country is in forme of a horne: For at the first it is narrow, and then groweth broder a little beyond the said towne of S. Germain. Eastward it bordereth vpon England: West, South, and North, the maine sea is round about it: it is a very barren soile, yéelding fruit more through trauell of the tillers and husbandmen, then through the goodnesse of the grounde: but there is great plentie of Lead and Tinne, in the myning and digging whereof doth specially consist the liuing and sustentation of the inhabitants. Their tongue is farre dissonant from English, but it is much like to the Walsh tongue, because they haue many words common to both tongues: yet this difference there is betwéen them, when a Walsh man speaketh, the Cornish man rather vnderstandeth many words spoken by the Walshman, then the whole tale he telleth; whereby it is manifest, that those three people doe vnderstand one another, in like maner as the Southern Scots doe perceiue and vnderstand the Northern. But it is a thing very rare and maruellous, that in one Iland there should be such variety of spéeches. Cornwall is in the Diocesse of Exceter, which was once worthie to be counted the fourth part of the Iland, for the contrarietie of the language. Afterwards the Normans, which constituted a kingdome of al those 3. parts, reckened Cornwall to be one of the Counties or shires of the Countrey. Thus much of the particular description of Brytaine, that the whole bodie of the Realme (by the members) maie bee the better knowne to some peraduenture that neuer heard the same before.

Strabo lib. 4. The forme of the Iland is Triquetra, or thrée cornered, hauing three corners, or three sides: two whereof, that is to say, the corner toward the East, and the other toward the West (both extending Northwards) are the longest.

The third side which is the South side, is farre shorter then the other: for the Iland is greater of length then of bredth. And as in the other two partes is conteined the length, euen so in the last, the bredth, in which place the bredth beginneth: and so continuing from the South part to the North, it is but narrow. The first and right corner of which Iland Eastward, is in Kent, at Douer and Sandwich. From whence to Calais or Bologne in France, is the distance of thirty miles. From this Angle, which is against Fraunce, to the third Angle, which is in the North in Scotland, the maine whereof boundeth vpon Germanie, but no land séene, (and there the Ilande is like vnto a wedge euen at the very Angle of the lande in Scotland,) the length is seauen hundred miles. Againe, gaine, the length from this corner at Douer in Kent, to the vttermost part of Cornwall, being S. Michaels mount (which is the West part or West Angle) is supposed to bee three hundred miles. From this left Angle being the West part and the vttermost part of Cornwall, which hath a prospect towardes Spaine, in which part also standeth Ireland, situate betweene Brytaine and Spaine to the North Angle in the further part of Scotland, in which part the Iland doeth end, the length is eight hundred miles, in which part there be very good hauens, and safe harborroughes for shippes, and apt passages into Ireland, being not past one daies sayling: but the shorter passage is from Wales to Waterford, a towne in Ireland vpon the Sea coast, much like to that passage betweene Douer and Caleis, or somewhat more: but the shortest passage of al, is out of Scotland. From this last Angle to Hampton, which is a Towne vpon the sea coast, with a hauen so called toward the South, and therefore called Southampton, betweene the Angles of Kent and Cornwall, they do measure by straight line the whole length of the Ilande, and doe saie, that it containeth eight hundred miles, as the breadth from Meneua or S. Dauids to Yarmouth, which is in the vttermost part of the Iland towardes the East, doth conteine two hundred miles, for the breadth of the Iland is in the South part, which part is the front and beginning of the land, and endeth narrow, or as it were in a streight. So the circuite or compasse of the Iland is, 1800. miles, which is 200. lesse then Cæsar doeth reckon or accompt.

Of the first habitation of this Iland, a short note to the Reader.

Genes. 10.

WHere it is recorded by the sacred and most auncient Historie, that after the vniuersall flood, the Isles of the Gentiles were diuided by the posterity of Iapheth the son of Noah, we doubt not but this Isle of Brytaine was also then peopled by his progenie, the history of whome, as it is to bee wished and appertinent to this purpose, so sith it is irrecouerable, not onely vnto vs, but also to other nations, I thinke it better to say nothing therein, then to set downe here Samothes, Magus, Sarron, Druys, and Bardus for his successours, which are vpholden and boulstered onely by the credite and authoritie of a newe small pamphlet falsely forged, & thrust into the world vnder the title of the ancient Historian Berosus. For that is the censure of all the best learned as concerning our common Berosus, which at his first appearing, about one hundred yeeres since, was partly suspect by Lodouicus Viues, afterward conuinced to be fabulous by the learned Gas. Varrerius, in a seuerall Treatise, and nowe vniuersally reiected of all skilfull Antiquaries, as a meere fable, vnworthy the name of Berosus. Therfore I dare not ground the beginning of our Historie vpon the credite thereof, vnlesse I would be preiudiciall to the truth, whereunto I leuell all my indeuour. I hope it shall be sufficient in this History for the Brytaines time, to follow the authoritie of the receiued Brytish History, which Geoffrey Archdeacon of Monmouth translated out of the Brytish tongue about 400. yeeres since, beginning with Brute, who after the progenie of Iapheth seemeth to be first discouerer, namer, and Ruler of this land. Yet before we enter into the Historie of Brute, it shall not bee impertinent to note here, that whereas Pomponius Mela mentioneth that one Hercules killed Albion a giant about the mouth of Rhosne in France, many learned men haue iudged the said Albion to haue ruled here, (sith the Greeke monuments doe alway call this Isle Albion,) and after his death that Hercules came hither, Lilius Giraldus writeth. An ancient Altar also containing the inscription of a vow found in the vttermost North part of Brytaine 1500. yeeres since, as Solinus reporteth, plainly prooued that Vlysses the renowmed Græcian in his tenne yeeres trauels, after the sacking of Troy, arriued in this our countrey.

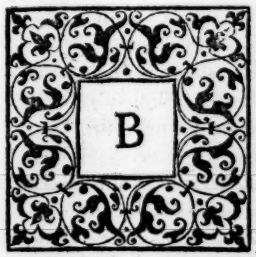
The race of the Kinges of Brytaine after the common receiued opinion since Brute, &c: and in the margent are placed the yeeres before Christ his birth, when euery King began their raignes, till Cunobelinus, in whose time Christ the Sauiour of the worlde was borne, and then following, the yeeres from Christ his birth are placed.



RVTE the sonne of Syluius, the sonne of Ascanius the sonne of Aeneas, after the death of his father, being banished into Grèece, deliuered there the remnant of the Troians from the long captiuitie, wherein they were deteined vnder the Grecians, with whom he departed thence for to sèeke some habitation: and associating to himselfe Corineus with his Troians whome he found in the waie, after a long and wearie iourney, and manie notable actes atchieued in Aquitaine, hee arriued in this Iland, which was called Albion at a place nowe called Totnes in Deuonshire, the yèere of the world, 2855. the yèere before Christes natiuitie, 1108. wherein hee first beganne to raigne, and named it Brytaine (as some write) or rather after his owne name Brutaine, as Aethicus that wonderfull Philosopher (a Scythian by race, but an Istrian by Countrey) translated by Saint Hierom aboue a thousand yèeres past, termeth both it and the Iles adiacent Insulas Brutanicas. And for more proofe of this restored name, not onely the said Philosopher (who trauelled through many landes, and in this land taught the knowledge of mynerall workes) may be alleadged, but sundrie other, as the Sibils Oracles, wherein the name of the Brytaines is written with y that is the Grèekes little u, which Oracles although they were not the Sibils owne worke, as some suspect, yet are they verie auncient indèede, and that they might sèeme more auncient, vse the most auncient name of Countries and peoples. And some English writers more then two hundred yèeres since, vsuallie doe name it Brutaine, and not otherwise, through a large discorie of this lande, translated out of French. Brute builded the citie of new Troy, now called London, hee stablished therein the Troian lawes, and gaue the vttermost Westerne part of the Realme to his companion Corineus, of whose name it was called Corinea, and to this daie Cornewall. Iohn Harding saieth, that Brute bare Gules, two Lyons rampant endorsed Oze. Also a banner vert, a Diana of gold sitchel crowned and inthronized, that were Aeneas armes, when he entred the land of Latins. Iohn Han-uile in Architrenio, and Nicholas Vpton, and other our auncient Heraults saie hee bare Oze, a Lyon passant, Gules, &c. Manie are desirous (saieth Aeneas Siluius) to knowe howe the name of Heraults came first in vse, who first ordeined them, and what office, and authority they beare amongst men. Beginning of Heraulds.

but as the nature of man is to desire knowledge of many things, and seking to be satisfied therein, I found in the reuestrie, or treasurie of S. Paules Church in London, (in anno 1451.) an olde history written (as the Title did specifie) 600. yeares before. Which if it be true, it may both satisfie my desire, and others in the premisses: the Authour of the booke, was Thucydides the Grecian, but the translatours name was not therein noted: but truly it was right eloquently set forth in the Latine tongue. The content of the wordes I doe not nowe well remember, but the tenure of the sentence, was well neere in this sort, as I shall declare, Heraulds be they, which our Elders were wont to call Heroes, that is to saie, those which were greater or surpassing all men in maiestie, and yet inferiours to the gods. For whom the people of antiquity did perceiue to be notable, and surmounting all others in his acts, and feates, renowned in vertues, and friendly, or gracious vnto them: him would they magnifie and exalt in the highest degree, and as it were, with their good words make them cousins to God almightie, placing them amongst the Gods, if it so were, that they had wrought some miraculous feate aboue the common course of nature. But if there were no such miraculous or wonderfull deedes, but that through their vertues they seemed wonderfull and honourable: then thought they to call such persons, not altogether gods, nor yet simple men, but inuented out a meane worde and name for them, calling them Heroes, as it were halfe gods. And of this worde Heroes or Heros, groweth by corruption of vse this name Herauld. Albeit some saie that those Heroes were olde souldiers, that had spent all their age welneere in the warres: out of the which sort the Heraulds ought to be chosen, and so the terme Herauld seemeth to bee a Duitch worde, and to sounde as much as an olde souldier, or man of war. But the first that begunne and ordeyned this order, was Dionysius, the which was the first also that inuaded India with an armed power, and gathered the rude people there together, which liued in woodes and desartes like wilde beastes, feeding on leaues, barkes of trees, and rawe flesh: teaching them to liue after a ciuile order and fashion: also to build Townes and villages, to worship the gods, to tilt and plowe the earth, to plant vineyards, and make wine, to weare apparel, to anoint and trim their bodies, and to be short, to liue after a humaine maner. And now following the common opinion, after Geffrey Monmouth.

Brute deuided the whole Iland among his three sonnes, which hee had by Innogen his wife, Locrine, Camber, and Albanact. Vnto Locrine he gaue the middle part betweene Humber and Seuerne, which of him was called Loegria. To Camber he gaue all the region beyond Seuern, which of him toke the name of Cambria, and is now called Wales. To Albanact he gaue all the landes beyond Humber, which of his name was called Albania: after which partition he deceased, when he had raigned foure and twenty yeares, and was buried at new Troy.

LOcrine, the eldest sonne of Brute, reigned twentie yeares: hee chased the Hunnes, which inuaded this realme: and pursued them so sharply, that many of them with their king, were drowned in a riuer which then parted England and Scotland. And for so much as the king of Hunnes, named Humber, was was there drowned, the riuer is til this day named Humber. This king Locrine had to wife Guendoline, daughter of Corineus, Duke of Cornwall, by whome he had a sonne named Madan. He also kept as Paramour, the beautiful Lady Estrilde, by whom he had a daughter named Sabrine. And after the death of Corineus, he put from him the saide Guendoline, and wedded Estrilde: but Guendoline repaired to Cornwall, where shee gathered a great power, and fought with King Locrine, and slewe him. He was buried at new Troy. She drowned the Lady Estrilde, with her daughter Sabrine in a riuer, that after the yong maidens name is call Seuerne.

MAdan, the Sonne of Locrine and Guendoline, was made ruler of Brytaine: he vsed great tyranny among his Britons: and being at his disport of hunting, he was deuoured by wild Wolues, when he had reigned xl. yéeres. He left two sons, named Mempricius and Manlius.

EBranke, the sonne of Mempricius, was made ruler of Brytaine, he had vii. wiues, of whom he receiued xx. sonnes, and xx. daughters: which were sent by their fathers to Alba Siluius, the fourth king of Albanois in Italy, to bee married to the Albanes. This Ebranke first after Brutus attempted to inuade France with an armie, as Iacobus Bergomas saieth in his first of his Chronicles, and Iacobus Lessabeus in the description of Henault affirmeth the same, and that he was driuen backe by Brunchildis Lord of Henault with no small losse of his men. Assaracus the second sonne of Ebranke, with the rest of his yonger brethren 18 at the least, by the aide of Alba Siluius, conquered all Germanie, which was then no great matter, for then Europe was verie small inhabited, saue onely about the Sea coasts, as Dalmatia, Italie and the coasts of France, as in reading the histories may easily be séene how the East people at sundry times came swarming into Europe. Of these brethren had Germanie the name, à Germanis fratribus, that had subdued it. Ebranke was a founder of manie Cities (saieth Bergomas) as Alcluid in Albania (nowe Scotland) which is after Hector Boetius, Dunbretaine, but other thinke the same to bee cleane destroied. He made the Castell of Maidens called Edenbrough. Hee made also the Castell of Bamburgh. In the xvii. yéere of his raigne he builded Kaerbranke, since by the Saxons called Euorwike, now corruptly Yorke, wherein 929 BRutus 2. the eldest sonne of Ebranke, succéded in the kingdome, and for that his father had receiued such a repulse at the handes of Brunchildis Lorde of Henault, he in reuenge thereof inuaded Henault with a great armie in the Fennes and Marshlande at the mouth of the Riuer Scaldis (of olde time named Stadus) and encamped himselfe vpon the Riuer Hania, where betwéene Brutus and Brunchildis, was foughten a strong battaile in that place, which to this day is called Estam-bruges, of the station and campe of Brutus, as Iacobus Lessabeus writeth in his description of Henault. This Brute of his lusty courage was surnamed Grœnehielde, hee raigned xii. yéeres, and was buried at Yorke.

A legion of the Romaines (as Vigetius reporteth) contained 6000. warriours or moe: which legion was deuided into tenne bandes, but the first passed all the rest, both in number of souldiers, and also in estimation: for this bande bare the Eagle, which was the chiefest standarde of the Romaines. This first bande contained 1105. fotemen, heauy armed horsemen 132. and was named Cohors milliaria, that is to saie, a compante of a thousand and moe souldiers. This bande is the head of all the legion: whensoeuer they must fight, these begin the battaile, and are first set in order in the front of the battaile. The second band containeth 555. fotemen, and 66. horsemen of heauie armour, and this band is called Cohors quingentaria, that is to saie, a companie of 500. and moe souldiers. The third band likewise hath 555. fotemen, and 66. horsemen. The fourth band hath 555. fotemen, and 66. horsemen. The fift band hath as manie. These fiue bands are set in aray in the first battaile. The sixt band hath 555. fotemen, and 66. horsemen. The seauenth band hath 555. fotemen, 66. horsemen. The eighth band hath 555. fotemen, 66. horsemen. The ninth band hath 555. fotemen, 66. horsemen. The tenth hath 555. fotemen, 66. horsemen. These tenne bandes make a full and perfect legion, containing, 6100. fotemen, and 726. horsemen. King Leill in the ende of his raigne fell to sloth and lust of the bodie, by meane whereof ciuill strife was raised, and not in his daies ended. And then Cunedagius was king of al Brytain. He builded a Temple of Mars at Perche, that now is S. Johns towne in Scotland, & placed there a Flamine. Macedones Macedones being beaten, kept them within the walles of their cities, Brennus like a conqueroure, against whome no man durst shewe his head to make resistance, forraged all the Iles of Macedone. And from thence as though those bootes and spoiles seemed to base and simple in his eie, he turned his minde to the Temples of the Gods immortall, malapertly scoffing that the Gods were rich, and ought to depart liberally to men. Therefore hee toke his iourney towards Delphos, setting more by the gaine of the golde that had beene offered to the Gods, then by their displeasure.

The Temple of Apollo at Delphos, is situate in the mount Parnassus, vpon a cliffe on euery side falling steepe downe. There the confluence of men hath made a populous Citie. Moreouer both the Temple and the towne are enclosed with the steepenesse of the rocke. The middle part of the rocke inwarde is in fashion like a Theatre, by meanes whereof when men make anie shouting, or any trumpet is sounded, the same breaketh and redoundeth in such wise vpon the stones from one to an other, that the Eccho is heard double and triple, the noise resounding farre lowder then it went forth. The which causeth the ignorant to stand in more feare, thinking it to be the presence of the Godhead. In the winding of the rocke, almost midwaie to the toppe of the hill, there is a little plaine, and in the same a deepe hole into the ground, which seemeth to giue oracles: out of the which a certaine colde breath ascending vpward, stirreth the mindes of the Prophets into a madnesse, and so compelleth them to giue answere to such as come for counsaile. In the same place therefore, there are to be seene manie and rich giftes of kings and peoples. Wherefore when Brennus came within the view of the Temple, he was in doubt a great while, whether he were better to attempt the matter forthwith, or giue his souldiours that nights respite to rest them. Euridanus and Thessalonus, who for couetousnesse of the pray, had ioyned themselues with him, willed to cut off all delaie, while their enemies were vnprouided, whereas by giuing them that nights respite, their enemies should perchance get both courage and succour: but the common souldiers of the Frenchmen, when after long penurie, they found a Countrey replenished with wine, and all other kinde of victuales, they dispersed themselues in the fieldes, making hauocke of all things like Conquerours, by which meanes the Delphians had respite to lay for themselues, and manned the Towne by the helpe of their neighbours, or euer the Frenchmen could be called from the Wine fat to the standard. Brennus had threescore and fiue thousand chosen fotemen of the best in all his host, whereas the Delphians were in all but 40000. fighting men. In disdaine of which small handfull Brennus to the intent to sharpen the mindes of his men, shewed them all, what a rich and plentifull prate they shoulde haue. The Frenchmen being by this vouching of their Captaine, or rather by their owne beholding, stirred vp, and also wounded with the wine they had powred in the day before, without respect of any danger ran headlong to the encounter. On the contrarie part, the Delphians putting more trust in God then in their owne strength, resisted their enemies, and what with stones, and what with their weapons, threw the Frenchmen (as they scaled) headlong from the top of the mountaine. Whyle the two parts were thus ſtriuing one with another, ſodainelie the Prieſtes of all the Temples, and the Prophets, with their haire about their eares, &c. like men diſtract and out of their wits, came running into the forefront of the battaile, crying out, that while they were all making their ſupplications to God for aide, they met a young man of beauty and perſonage, far excelling anie mortall creature, and in his company two Virgins in armor, wherefore they beſought them, ſeeing the gods did garde their ſtandarde, they ſhould not ſticke to diſpatch their enemies. And therewithall they forthwith perceiued that God was preſent on their ſide. For both a peece of the mountaine being broken off, by a ſodaine earthquake, ouerwhelmed the French hoſte, and the thickeſt of their enemies (not without great ſlaughter) were opened and put to flight. In the necke whereof there enſued a tempeſt, with haile, thunder and lightning, conſuming as manie as were anything ſore wounded. The captaine Brennus himſelfe not being able to abide the ſmarte of his woundes, toke a ſword and killed himſelfe. Thus farre abridged out of Iuſtine.

Beline in the meane time (ſaieth Gaufride) both in ciuill iuſtice and alſo Religion, greatly increaſed his Realme. He made three Archflamines, whoſe Seas were at new Troy, Kayerbranke and Kayerlegion. He finiſhed the foure great waies begunne by his father: he ſubdued and made tributary vnto him Denmarke. In newe Troy he made the hauen, which at this day retaineth the name of him, called Belines gate. He maried his daughter Cambria vnto a Prince of Almaine called Antenor, of whom theſe people were called Cymbri, and Sycambri.

Rouſe ſaith he builded Caier Merith, that is, Longceſtra: he ſubdued Denmarke, compelling them to continue their tribute, and in his returne home, mette with a fleete of Baſdenſes comming from the parts of Spaine, which were ſeeking for habitations, becauſe their countrey was ſo populous, and not able to ſuſtaine them, to whom the king granted the Iſle of Ireland to inhabite, and to hold the ſame of him as their Soueraigne Lorde: But the Scots write, that Spaniards arriued before this time in Ireland. This Gurgunſtus builded Porcheſter and Warwike in the middle of the Realme (ſaith I. Rouſe.) He raigned xxix. yeres, and was buried at Caerlheon.

Cecilius

CEcilius the sonne of Guintheline and Mercia, raigned viii. yeares, (as the Scots write.) In the first yeare of his raigne, a people called Pictes, arriued here in Brytain, & possessed those parts, which now be the Marches of both realmes, England and Scotland. Cecilius was buried at Caerlheon. 350

The Pictes first inhabited the Marches.

KImarus succeeded Cecilius, who being a wilde young man, and liuing after his owne lust, raigned but three yeares, and was slaine as he was hunting of wild beastes. 323

Elanius, called also Danius, was king of Brytaine nine yeares. 321

MOrindus, the bastard sonne of Danius, beganne to raigne in Brytaine: hee fought with a king who came out of Germanie, and slewe him with all his power. Moreouer, out of the Irish seas in his time came forth a wonderfull Monster, which destroied much people: whereof the king hearing, would of his valiant courage needes fight with it, by whome he was cleane deuoured, when he had raigned eight yeares. 311

GOrbomannus, eldest sonne of Morindus, raygned xi. yeares: a Prince iust and religious: he renued the Temples of his gods, and gouerned his people in peace and wealth. This Gorbomannus builded Grantham in Lincolneshire. Our English Chronicle saith, he builded both the townes of Cambridge and Grantham: but seeing that Cambridge in ancient Chronicles is called Grant (as it is also Grancheſter, Catergrant, and Grantbridge) it was an easie matter (as Grammarians know) to translate Grantham into Cambridge, and so ascribe the building of both Townes to him that builded but one, or neither of them both. 303

ARchigallo, brother to Gorbomannus, was crowned king of Brytaine: he was in conditions vnlike to his brother: for he deposed the noblemen, and exalted the vnnoble. He extorted from men their goods to enrich his treasurie: for which cause by the estates of the Realme he was depriued of his royall dignitie, when he had raigned v. yeares. 292

The king deprived.

ELidurus, the third sonne of Morindus, and brother to Archigallo, was elected King of Brytaine: a vertuous and gentle Prince, who gouerned his people iustlie. As he was hunting in a forrest, by chaunce he met with his brother Archigallo, whome most louinglie he embraced, and found the meanes to reconcile him to his Lords, and then resigned to him his royall dignitie, when he had raigned v. yeares. 286

ARchigallo thus restored to his royall estate, ruled the people quietlie and iustlie ten yeares, and was buried at Yorke. 282

ELidurus aforenamed, after the death of his brother Archigallo, for his pietie and iustice, by the generall consent of the Brytaines was againe chosen king. But he raigned not passing ii. yeares, for his yonger brethren Vigenius, and Peredurus rayſed warre against him, toke him prisoner, and cast him in prison, where he remained during their raigne. 272

VIgenius and Peredurus, after the taking of their brother, raigned together seuen yeares. Vigenius then died, and Peredurus raigned after alone two yeares. Hee builded the Towne of Pickering in the north partes of Yorkeshire. 270

261 ELidurus, the third time was made King, who continued his latter raigne honourably and iustly: but being sore brused with age and troubles, he finished his life, when he had now lastlie raigned foure yéeres.

258 Gorbonian raigned in Brytaine ten yéeres.

248 Morgan guided the Realme peaceably foureténe yéeres.

224 EMerianus his brother, when he had tyrannously raigned seauen yéeres was deposed.

227 IVal was chosen king for his iustice and temperance, which gouerned peaceably twentie yéeres.

191 Geruncius raigned in Brytaine twentie yéeres.

171 CAtellus raigned peaceably ten yéeres, hee hung vp all oppressours of the poore, to giue example vnto other.

161 Coilus succéeded Catellus, who quietly raigned twentie yéeres.

142 Porrex, a vertuous and gentle Prince, raigned fiue yéeres.

135 Fulgen his sonne raigned two yéeres in Brytaine.

133 Eldred raigned in Brytaine but one yéere.

132 Androgius likewise raigned but one yéere.

136 Eliud raigned fiue yéeres, who was a great Astronomer.

120 Detonus raigned in this land two yéeres.

118 Gurgineus raigned thrée yéeres in Brytaine.

115 Merianus was king of Brytaine two yéeres.

113 Bladunus gouerned this land of Brytaine two yéeres.

111 Capenus raigned king of Brytaine thrée yeeres.

106 Silius raigned in this land of Brytaine two yéeres.

Lud

LVd the eldeſt ſonne of Hely ſucceéded his father: he amended his lawes, and toke away all vſages that were naught: moreouer he repaired the Citie of newe Troy with faire buildings and walles: and builded on the weſt part thereof, a ſtrong gate, which vnto this time retaineth the name of him and is called Ludgate. Finally, he died, leauing after him two ſonnes Androgius, or Auaroius, and Theomantius: who not being of the age to gouerne, their vncle Caſsibelane obtained the Crowne. London toke the name of Lud, and was called Ludſton, as ſaieth Geffrey. 66 Lud repaired and fortified London. Flores Hiſtoriæ. Ludſton, or London tooke the name of king Lud.

CAſsibelanus, the ſon of Hely, after the death of his brother Lud, was made gouernour of Brytaine, which ruled xii. yéeres. In the viii. yeere of his raigne, Iulius Cæſar comming vnto that part where Caleis and Boloign now ſtand, determined to make warre into Brytaine, which vntill that time remained vnfrequented and vnknowne of the Romanes. His quarrell was, becauſe that in the warres of France, he perceiued the Frenchmen to haue much ſuccour and aide from thence: And becauſe hee coulde not vnderſtand nor learne the greatneſſe or ſtate of the Iland, neither what Nations they were which inhabited the ſame, nor what lawes, cuſtomes, or kinde of gouernment they vſed, nor yet what Hauens they had able to receiue any number of ſhippes, he ſent Caius Voluſenus before with a galley, to diſcouer as much as he coulde, concerning thoſe matters, who within fiue daies after returned to Cæſar, declaring ſuch things as he had learned by coaſting alongſt the ſhore, for he durſt not for feare of the Brytains ſtirre out of his galley. In the meane ſpace there came Embaſſadours from many Cities of the Iſle, and deliuered him Hoſtages, with whome hee ſent Comius of Arras, charging him to exhort and perſwade the reſt of the Cities and Counties to do the like. And he himſelfe ſhortly after hauing prepared lxxx. ſhips, ſailed into Brytaine, where at the firſt being wearied with an hard and ſharp battaile, and after with ſodain tempeſt his nauy almoſt deſtroied, he returned again into France, there to winter his mē. 58 Iulius Cæſar his firſt voyage into England. Eutropius. Cæſars Commentaries.

The next Spring (which was the yeere before Chriſt 51.) his naule being newe rigged and encreaſed, he paſſed the Seas againe with a greater armie: but whiles he went towardes his enemies on land, his ſhippes lying at anker, were driuen on the ſandes, where they ſtacke faſt: or elſe through beating one againſt another, with force of the tempeſt, they were deſtroyed, ſo that fourty were loſt, the other with much labour were ſaued. In the meane ſpace Scæua, one of Cæſars ſouldiers, with foure others, who before in a ſmall veſſell were conueied to a rocke néere the Iſle, and by ebbing of the Ocean being forſaken, a great number of Brytains fell on a few Romans, and ſome of his companions (though but few) found meanes to returne by boate, but Scæua remained without feare in the middeſt of his enemies darts: firſt with his ſpeare he reſiſted them, after with his ſword he alone fought againſt many of them, and when he was both weary and wounded, and had loſt his helmet and ſhield, with two light harneſſes, he ran to Cæſars tents, and aſked pardon of the Emperor for his ouerboldneſſe, who not onely forgaue him, but honoured him with the office of a Centurion. Cassibelanus with a great multitude of people was keeping the bankes, who had set all the sayd bankes, and all the shallowe places, vnder the water with sharpe stakes, euery one of them as bigge as a mans thygh, bound about with lead, & driuen so fast into the bottome of the riuer, that they can neuer be remoued, (so sayth Bede and Asser) who affirme that in their times the saide stakes

London submitteth to Cesar in the meane time, the Trinobants, which is the strongest Citie welneere of all those contries submitted it selfe, and deliuered hostages to Cæsar, who at their requeste placed Mandubratius to bee their gouernour, whose father called Imanentius, being chiefe Lord or ruler of the Trinobants, Cassibelane had before slaine, wherewith Mandubratius fled, and comming to Cæsar, not only submitted himselfe, but also was a great meanes (as manie do write) for Cæsar to subdue the rest: yet did Cassibelane send messengers to the foure kinges that ruled in the quarters of Kent, that with all their puissance they shoulde set on the Romans that late nert them: their names were Cingetorex, Caruilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, who obeying his requeste were discomfited, and Cingetorex taken, wherewithall Cassibelane being dismaied after manie losses, was constrained to giue pledges, and to agree that Brytaine should become tributarie to the Romans. Thus Brytaine became tributarie to the Romanes, the yere of ỳ world 3913. after the building of Rome 698. before Christs birth 53.

When Cæsar like a conquerour, with a great number of prisoners sayled into France, and so to Rome, where after his returne out of Brytaine, hee consecrated to Venus a surcote of Brytaine pearles, the desire whereof partlie moued him to inuade this Countrey: shortlie after he was by the Senate slaine in the Councell house.

Cæsars Commentaries, touching the barbarousnes of Brytaines. Cæsar in his Commentaries describeth the Brytains thus. The inner part (saith he) is inhabited of such, as by witnes of their ancient Records were born and bred in the Ile, and the sea coast by such as haue passed thither out of Belgike to fetch bootes, and to make war. All the which welneere, are called by the names of the Cities where they were borne, and from whence they first came, remaining there still when the warre was done, and tilling the ground. The country is marueilously well replenished with people, and there be very many buildings, almost like in fashion to the building of Gallia. There is great store of cattell. The coine they vse is either of brasse, or else ringes of yron sised at a certaine waight in stead of money. In the inner parts of the Realme groweth tinne: and in the sea coast groweth yron, but hereof is small store. The brasse that they occupy is brought in from beyond the sea. There is timber of al kinds as in Gallia, sauing beech and firre. They thinke it a hainous matter to taste of a hare, a henne, or a goose: neuertheless they cherish them for their pleasure. The aire is more temperate in those places then in France, & the colde lesser.

Of

Of all the inhabitants of this Ile, the ciuilest are the Kentishfolke, the which Country marcheth altogether vpon the sea, and differeth not greatly from the manner of France. Those that dwell more into the hart of the Realme, for the most part sowe no corne, but liue by milke and flesh, and clothe themselues in lether. All the Brytaines doe die themselues with woad, which setteth a blewish colour vpon them, and it maketh them more terrible to beholde in battaile. They weare their haire long, and shaue all parts of their bodies sauing ỳ head and the vpper lippe. They haue .x. or xii. wiues a péece, common among themselues, specially brothers with brothers, and parents with their children, but the issue that commeth of them, is accompted his that first married the mother when she was a maide, &c. 40 Rabbi Jonathan Onkelos Author of ỳ Chaldee Paraphrase sler.

THeomantius the sonne of Lud, and nephewe to Cassibelane, succéded in the Realme of Brytaine, and raigned quietlie xviii. yéeres, paying the tribute to the Romans which Cassibelane had granted. 37

OCtauius Augustus desiring to bee like Iulius Cæsar his father (for so he alwaies termed him) prepared an expedition into Brytain, but being come forward into France, vnderstanding that the Pannonians lately subdued, rebelled, he turned his power against them, and altered his minde as touching our Countrey. 34 Dion. Cassius lib. 49.

The fourth yéere after, hee opened the Temple of Ianus at Rome, fullie determining to inuade Brytaine, but when he had marched on his way, as far as Ariminum, Ambassadors of Brytaine met him, humbly suing for peace, and submitting themselues vnto his obedience and protection. Wherfore he stayed againe to settle some troubles then raised in France. 25 Dion. 55. Golezius.

The yéere following, because the couenants betwéene him and the Brytains could not be agréed vpon, hee made prouision for a third expedition into this Ile, but an actuall rebellion in Biscay and Sauoy withheld him then also. But shortly after Ambassadours came from Brytaine to Rome, intreating for peace, swearing fealtie in the Temple of Mars, offering giftes in the Capitol to the Gods of the Romanes: and submitted part of the Ile vnto Augustus. Now the Brytaines began first to pate tolles and tribute without grudging, for all wares which they traded, which were for that time, Iuorie bores, tongues, owches, and other trinkets of Amber and Glasse. And all here were so quiet, that one band of soldiers and a few horsemen, were sufficient to kéepe the Ile in the Romane possession. 24 Strabo. lib. 4.

CVnobelinus, for so is the inscription of his coine, which I haue séene, and read, and therefore corruptly called Kymbeline, the sonne of Theomantius raigned king in Brytaine xxvb. yéeres. In the xliii. yéere of his raigne Christ our sauiour was borne in Bethlehem of Iuda. 14

From this place following, the yeeres from Christ his birth are placed in the Margent.

But here is to be noted, that the firſt yeare of our Lord hath but ſeuen daies, after ſome computation, for he was borne the xxv. day of December, and the firſt of Januarie following, began the ſecond yeare.

31. GViderius, the firſt ſon of Cunobelinus, was ordained king. This man was valiant, hardy, wealthy, and truſted much in his ſtrength. And for that he thought the Romans had their tribute wrongfully, he of great courage denied to paie the ſame.

Wherefore Tyberius the Emperour purpoſed to come hither in perſon, but death preuented him. Guiderius raigned xviii. yéres. 40 ALbeit the Britaine hiſtorie doth here place Aruiragus, yet it is probable that Cunobelinus as yet liued, for about 40. yeares after Chriſt, Admimus the ſon of Cunobeline baniſhed out of Britain by his father, was receiued into protection by Caius Caligula the fourth Emperour, who was then ſet forwarde with great preparation againſt Britaine, but when he came into the partes of Holland againſt Norffolke he ſtaied, writing vaunting letters to the Senate, that all Britaine was yelded vnto him, becauſe Admimus had ſo done. Afterward as though he would immediatly fight a field, he caſt his men into battels and ſquadrons vpon the ſea coaſt, diſpoſing all his Engines in moſt warlike manner (no man knowing what he meant:) this done, he himſelfe in a Galley launched into the ſea, and immediatly returning, he cauſed the Trumpets to ſound to battaile, and ſodainelie commaunded them to gather Cockles and Muſcle ſhelles, and therewith to fill their helmets, ſaying, they were ſpoyles due to the Capitoll, and in theſe ſpoyles hee greatlie triumphed, as though he had ſubdued the Ocean. He rewarded his ſouldiours and returned to Rome, after he had built a high watch Tower in token of his victory againſt the ſea, ꝑ ruines wherof are great remaining in Holland, but ouerflowed by the water, & to this day called ꝑ Brytons houſe, in remembrãce of this ridiculous expedition againſt Britain, by the perſwaſion of Bericus baniſhed out of Britaine.

He behaued himselfe very courteously towards diuers of his friends, in so much that when Plancius (a notable man) who in his voyage which he made into Brytain, atchieued diuers notable acts, and should triumph for the same, the Emperor himselfe accompanied him, and (the vse being such that with his triumph hee should go vp into the Capitoll) Claudius gaue him the preheminence, and went on the left hand.

1 Councel of Tomasa

At this time Vespasian who was after Emperor, was sent by Claudius into Brytaine, where he fought 30. times with the Brytains, subdued to the Roman Empire two worthy nations, aboue 20. townes, and the Ile of Wight.

OStorius was appointed lieutenant in Brytaine for the Romanes, who at his first entry in the beginning of Winter assayleth the Brytains, & purposeth to pen them vp and include them with riuers & fortifications, wherefore the Iceni made an insurrectiō, which when he had pacified with some slaughter, he marched against the Gangi, forraging al the countries as he passed, but was forced by new tumults to turne from thē against ẏ Brigants, whome with some slaughter, and promise of pardon, he pacified. Then he made prouision against the Silures which inhabited Southwales, bearing themselues bolde vpon the puissance of Caratacus a valiant Brytaine, who being skilfull of the Countrey, remoued the war into Shroplhire, where he fortified amongst craggie mountaines a place strong by situation, where neuerthelesse the Romans preuailed. The wife, daughter, and brethren of Caratacus were taken, & he flying to Cartismandua a M. ruling in Yorkeshire, was by her deliuered captiue to his enemies, ix. yeares after the wars began, who sending him to Rome, was there in open assemblie brought before Claudius, with his wife, daughter, brethren, and friends, and such spoiles as had bēn taken from him, where hee (nothing dismaied in spirit or countenance,) spake after this sort to Claudius.

Agrippa K. of Iudea.

If my moderation of prosperous successes had bēne correspondent to my state and nobilitie, I might haue come to this Citie, rather a friend then a captiue: neither you haue disdained to admit me into league, being descended of noble parentage, & soueraigne ouer many nations. This present state of mine, as it is villanous toward me, so it is honorable to you. I had horse, men, money, munition, and what wonder is there, If I had lost them vnwillingly? For if you will rule and raigne ouer all, of necessitie all must come into seruery: if I had yelded at the first, neither my fortune nor thy glory had bin renowmed, and the oblition of me had ensued immediately after my execution: but if you saue my life, it shall be an euerlasting exāple of your clemency. At these words Claudius remitted his offence, granted him life, & the Senate adiudged Ostorius worthy to triumph: but in the meane time ẏ inhabitants of South-wales to reuenge Caratacus captiuity intercepted and discomfited certaine bands of the Romans, amidst which new wars, Ostorius tired with trauel, departed this life.

In Ostorius time certaine Cities were giuen to Cogidunus a Brytish king, and a Colonie of Romanes was placed here.

CLaudius sent Didius to supply the place of Ostorius now departed, but in the meane time the Silures fought fortunately against the legions which was vnder the conduct of Manlius Valens. In this time warre brake out be-twéne Cartismanda Q. of the Brigants, and Venutius her husband, whome she refused, and matched her selfe with Velocatus his Esquire: whereupon Venutius fauored of the people, assailed her territory, and she succoured by the Romans, after she had intercepted by trechery Venutius brother and allies, fought with him. Where after a sharpe fight, she by the aid of the Romans, preuailed, as also Cæsius Nasica did with his legion against the Brytaines in another place: for Didius vsed others in these matters, because he was aged, and onely kept that which others had heretofore conquered.

ned the Romane Empire, and about the 7. yéere of his raigne Verennus was appointed lieutenant here, who died within the first yéere of his go-uernment, saying that hee woulde haue subdued prouinces, had he surui-ued but two yéeres, but about this time great slaughter was here of the Romans.

62 SVetonius Paulinus was then sent hither, who at his arriuall purposing to subdue Anglesey, whither many Brytains had withdrawne themselues, hee in vessels with flat kéeles ferried ouer his footmen, bringing ouer his horsmen by some fourds, whereas on the shores stood closely together great numbers of Brytans, and among them women gadding vp and down frantickly in mourning wéedes, their haire hanging about their eares, and shaking firebrands: the Druydes also casting vp their hands towards heauen thundred out cruell execrations, with which vncomely sights the Romans at first stoode dismaied, but Dion. Cassius. after encouraged by the Generals perswasion, they brust in among them, made great slaughter, got the possession of the Ile, and felled downe the woods consecrated to superstitious vses: two cities belonging to ẏ Romans were taken, 80000. of their people slaine, and the whole Iland reuolted, and to the Romans reproch, the slaughter was cõmitted by a woman, being foretold then by many strange signes & tokens. For in the court was heard a noise with much slaughter. In the Theatre a great tumult and much wondring, when there was no man there, that either spake or mourned. Besides, in ẏ riuer of Thames certain houses or buildinges were séene. The Image of the goddesse Victoria in the Temple of Camulodunum (which is Maldon in Eller as W. Camden writeth) turned her backe as though she had yélded to her enemies: the women ranne as mad here and there, saying, and singing, Destruction is at hand.

Finally, betwixt the Iland and France, the Ocean sea appeared as it flowed with blood. The occasion of this warre was a confiscation of the Brytans goods, which being remitted by Claudius the Emperour, Decianus Catus then Procurator of the Ile, said that it ought to haue beene renued. To this cause was added, that whereas (against their wils Seneca had lent them fourty Sester-cies vpon great vsurie) he now with great force and all kind of violence compelled them to pay all the whole summe at one paiment, and also perswaded them to make warre on the Romans.

Bunduica of Brytaine, a woman of noble byrth, not onelie with much honour ruled amongst them, but also was the soueraigne in their wars, and had

in

in déed a stomacke more manly then womanlike: who hauing gotten together an army of 120000. men, got her vpon her seat made of Parish turues, after the manner of the Romanes, and being a tall woman, of comely shape, and seuere countenance, sharpe voice, with yellowe haire hanging downe to her skirtes, (Ponticus Virunius saith to her thighs) she ware a great chaine of golde, and had on her backe a coate of sundrie colours, and a plaited kirtle. When she was thus apparelled, and had in her hands a great speare, she spake vnto them to this effect. Ponticus Virunius.

First shée commended libertie, shewing them how pouertie with libertie, was farre better then great riches in miserie and bondage: on the other side, with great eloquence she declared the mischiefes and calamities they suffered at the handes of the Romanes, who exacting Tributes of paiments, so oppressed them, that much better it were once to die, then long to liue in such extreme seruitude.

Secondly she reproued them, for not expelling their enemies, as their forefathers had done Iulius Cæsar, Claudius and Caligula: And againe she praysed them for their present readines to helpe her, and recouer their ancient state.

Thirdly, she disabled the Romanes, for that they were fewe, combred with armour, and so faint of courage, that they had rather fight a farre off, then encounter with them by hand strokes: she commended the Brytanes, to be more in number, of greater valour, and farre more able to abide hunger, cold, thirst, raine, winde, heat, &c. she added the vantage of the place, as being at home, where the woods and riuers, lakes, and all other thinges were well knowne to euerie one of them.

Lastly, she exhorted them to shew themselues as Dogs and wolues among fearefull Hares and Fores: wherewithall, she let out of her lap a quicke Hare, thereby to learne the euent of her enterprice. The Hare hauing a prosperous passage, all the multitude gaue a great showte, and Bunduica clapping her hands, gaue thanks to her Gods, that she ruled not the Romans, as did Nero, (who though he were a man, yet was in déede but a woman, for that he sang and plaid on the Harpe) but the Brytains, who estéemed it better to be Warriours then Ploughmen, who, as they had all things in common, so had they both wiues and children, and that hauing a kingdome amongst such a kinde of people, she prayed their diuine aides against a spitefull and wicked kinde of men, if they were to bee called men, who vsed hote bathes, dainty fare, wine, ointments, lay in soft beds, and were vassals to such a wanton Minstrell as their Emperour Nero was. What the Brytans were giuen to. Niceneſſe of the Romanes.

Bunduica hauing spoken these and such like amongst her people, withall her hoste shee set forward against the Romanes, who at that time were without head or gouernor, for that Paulinus was gone with his armie into Anglesey, (as is before rehearsed,) which is an Iland nere Brytaine, by meanes whereof Bunduica toke two of their Cities, and committed the notable slaughter before remembred.

She exercised all kinde of crueltie on such men as she toke. As for the noble women that she gate, shee hanged them vp, and cut off their pappes, and sewed sewed them to their mouthes: besides this, she stretching their bodies out at length, thrust sharpe stakes cleane through them: all which thinges were done in despight, when they sacrificed and feasted in their Temples, but specially in the wood called Andates.

Paulinus, who had now subdued Anglesey, hearing of the foresaid slaughter, returned to Brytaine, yet would he not aduenture the fortune of battaile with them, fearing their number, but when he wanted victuall, and that his enemies approched, he was compelled to abide the battell. Bunduica, who had in her army 230000. men, was her selfe placed in a Chariot, and ordered her men at length: but Paulinus could not stretch his companie so long, for that they were not of anie such number; but at length he deuided his armie into three partes, so that at one time they might fight in sundry places, exhorting them not to be abashed at the multitude of their enemies, for both they and their forefathers, had with lesse number atchieued greater matters, and gotten greater victories. Adding, that nowe was the time to plaie the men, to enioy that in quiet, which before their ancestours had won, and recouer that which they had lost, or else to liue for euer in miserie and shame. Againe, hee shewed what crueltie their eies had seene, by those barbarous people, to such as they had ouercome, exhorting them in reuenge thereof to fight manfully, and there was no doubt but the Gods (who were alwaies fauourable to such as had suffered cruelty) would helpe them: and better it were to die fighting valiantly, then with reproch to be taken, and die in their enemies hands like dogges. Finally (saith he) whether we liue or die, Brytaine shall bee ours; for, though the other Romanes lose it, yet shall our bones continually keepe it. When he had thus spoken, the signe of the battell was giuen, and eache part prepareth himselfe: the Brytains with great and strange noise, the Romans in silence came so neere, that they might throwe their dartes to them: and perceiuing their enemies to approach, with great violence, rushed in amongst them, and brake their aray: but after being compassed with the multitude of their enemies, the battell waxed doubtfull. The light harnessed men began to smite eache other, and those of heauie armour together with the horsemen encountred, and the Roman Archers fought against the Brytish Chariots. They which fought without breastplates, were slaine with Darts. This encounter was made in three seuerall places, and was fought with great courage on both sides. At the last the Romans departed Conquerors, many were slaine in the battaile, and many were taken. Great numbers which escaped, prepared to fight againe, but in the meane space Bunduica died of a disease which shee had, and they mourned, and buried her verie honourably. After those that remained were easilie ouercome and dispersed.

Cornelius Tacitus.

Tacitus saith, that Prasutagus King of the Iceni, a Prince of great wealth, appointed, that Cæsar and his owne two daughters should inherite his lands, hereby thinking all his life to be more quiet, and being deceassed, his wife and daughters should be the more safer by meanes of such protection: but it fell out farre otherwise, for the Centurions gat his Realme, their seruants spoiled his house, beate his wife, and deflowred his daughters: besides, the chiefest men of his land were displaced of their inheritances, and handled extremelie. In reuenge whereof Bunduica raised the warre, and committed the slaughter before remembred, and at last her armie once ouerthrown by Paulinus, being afraid to fall into her enimies hands, she poisoned her selfe.

Policletus then a seruaunt of Neros was sent hither to surueie the state of Brytaine, who discharged Paulinus Suetonius of the gouernement.

64 Petronius Turpilianus.

PEtronius Turpilianus was sent into Brytaine as a man easie to bee entreated, and being not altogether acquainted with offences of the enimies, was the readier to receyue them to grace: who setting matters in their former stay, and attempting no farther, deliuered the Prouince vnto Trebellius Maximus. Trebellius being both faint hearted and too sluggish, and also vtterlie vnacquainted with experimentes of armes, ruled ỳ prouince with a certain mildnes of gouernement. Now had the barbarous people also learned to wincke at inticing vices, and the ciuill warres of the Romanes then happening, was a cloake to his cowardise: but there presentlie arose discord betweene Roscius and Cælius, legates of the xx. legion, when the souldiours (accustomed to bee employed in expeditions) gaue themselues to lasciuiousnes: whereuppon Trebellius tooke his flight, and hid his head, to auoide the furie of the armie, and in most base and beastly manner, gouerned (as it were) by entreatie, so as they might seeme to haue compounded, that the souldiours should liue in all liberty, and the Generall at his safetie. This time for a yeere and halfe there was deadly ciuill warre among the Romanes for the Empire, betweene Galba, Otho, and Vitellius.

69 Alienus Volanus.

VEctius Volanus, then was sent hither by Vitellius, he did not vse anie discipline or correction in Brytaine, so as there continued the like slouth and cowardise in the souldiers, toward their enimies, and the Campe still as full of wantonnesse, sauing that Volanus was a good and milde man, and thereby made himselfe beloued where hee shoulde haue beene feared. In this time Vitellius aduanced manie Souldiours in the Brytaine legions, and Herdonius Flaccus brought vnto him 80000. chosen men of warre out of Brytaine. The Brytaines seeing the Romanes thus encombred with ciuill warre, began to trouble them, wherefore Volanus would send no succor to Vitellius at his commandement, when Vespasian warred against him for the Empire, and all the Brytaines fauoured Vespasian.

VVHen as (with the rest of the world) Vespasian had recouered Brytaine, then were there placed great Captaynes, and notable armies, the enemies hope abated, and Petilius Cerealis brought great feare vppon the Brytaines. The Citie of the Brigantes (which was accounted one of the greatest of the land) being by him assailed, he hadde many encounters, and some not without slaughter, whereby hee either conquered or assayled a great part of their Countrey.

Iulius Frontinus, a man as worthie and valiant as was possible, tooke then the charge vpon him, and subdued the nation of the Silures, being both valiant and warlike, notwithstanding the valour of the enemie and difficulties of the places.

Iulius Frontinus.

This

Iulius Agricola.

This was the state of Brytain, and course of the wars, which Agricola found arriuing in the middest of Sommer, the souldiers euen then beginning to retire to their strengths, and the enemie searching for his most aduantage.

The Citie of the Ordouices fewe daies before his arriuall almost wholy defeated a company lying vpon their borders. This beginning stirred vp the prouince, seruing for an example to them, who coueted the warres, and yet desired to see what was in their newe Gouernour. Agricola, although the Sommer were nowe well spent, the bandes dispersed all about the prouince, the souldiers had determined to rest for that yeere, the time being late and incommodious to commence the war, thinking it would be better to man the places most suspected: yet he determined neuertheless to preuent daunger, and gathering together the Standardes of the Legions, with a fewe of his foraine aides, for that the Ordouices durst not take the fielde, marched forth against them himselfe in the vauward of his armie, that others might take like courage in the same danger, and put almost that whole nation to the sword: then following his good successe, hee inuaded Angleſey, (which Suetonius had before attempted) causing certaine Brytaines that serued him, and knewe the shallowes and maner of swimming, with horse and harnelle to passe ouer into the Tacitus. Ile on a sodaine, wherewith the inhabitants were so amazed (who fearing nothing because they sawe no naule) that they submitted the Ile vnto him immediately. Now hauing some quietnelle, and perceiuing that warre would little preuaile against the Brytaines, if they were iniuriously handled, he purposed to cut off all causes of quarrell, and first reforming his own familie, did nothing partially, onely respected the vertue of men, lowered tributes, and behaued himselfe most honourably. And thus much the first yeere.

When the Sommer began, he assembled his armies, trained his souldiers, forraged the enemies Countries with sodaine inuasions to their great feare, and yet so fauorably, as manie Countries willinglie yelded vnto him, and suffered Castels to bee built among them. The Winter following he spent in ciuill administration, counsailing the people priuatelie, and helping them publikely, to build houses, Temples, and Court houses. He procured noble mens children to study liberall Sciences, and then began the Brytaines to conforme themselues to Romane fashions and attyre.

The third yeere he discouered people in the North hither to vnknowen, euen as far as Tau, terrifying the people, and placing fortreſſes most wisely to the annoyance of the enemie.

The fourth Sommer he emploied getting those Countries which hitherto hee had passed through, euen to Edenborough, Frith, and Cluid, the narrow space betweene the which waters he fortified.

The fifth yeere by Sea he discouered and banquished further nations in the North, and placed garrisons in the coast toward Ireland, whereunto hee also aspired, and to that ende retained an Irish Prince with him, that was driuen out of his Countrey by ciuill dissention.

But in the Sommer which began the sixt yeere of his gouernment, he searched the Hauens by a naule for that purpose sent to the Sea, fearing least all those nations beyonde had united themselues and kept the passages by lande: but afterward he marched forward, his naule coasting with his army by land, so as sometime in the same Campe, he had horsemen, footemen, and Seamen, lodged together. It was reported by such as were taken prisoners, that the sight of the naule much astonied the Brytaines as men from whom all refuge was cutte off, the secretes of their Seas being discouered: therefore determining to trie it with hand blowes the inhabitantes of Calidonia with great preparation, although the report thereof were greater (as it often happeneth in vnknowen matters,) of their owne accorde, assayled some Castles, and seeing themselues rather to bee assaylantes then defendantes, put the Romanes in some doubt: where upon the cowardes pretending pollicie, aduised to retyre on this side Bodotria, rather then to bee driuen thereto by force, when as in the meane while, Agricola knowing that the enemie would charge him in seuerall troupes and companies, and fearing to bee ouermatched and couped in with number, or deceiued by the ignorance of the place, diuided his army into three battels, and so marched forward: which order marked by his enemies, made them alter their purpose, and in the night killing the watch, brake in vpon the ninth legion, halfe a sléepe and halfe affrighted, which (as they tooke it) was the weakest, and so the fight continued within the Campe till it was day light, at which time the Romanes began to gather courage, and the Brytains were discomfited, so as, had it not bin for the woods and bogges, that victorie had ended the whole strife, after which battell the Roman souldiours grewe to be of hautie courage, crying out to pierce the countrey of Calidonia, that they might finde out the vttermost portes and boundes of Brytaine. The Romanes on the other side, ascribing the praise of this victorie, not to the prowesse of the Roman souldier, but to Fortune and the wilinesse of their Captaine, vsed all meanes possible, to hearten vp and arme their youth, bestowing their wiues and children in places of safegard, and by sacrifices and holy assemblies vnite al their Cities together: vpon these resolutions they remoued.

In the beginning of the nert sommer which was the viii. yeere of his charge, Agricola sending his fléete before him, which often put a land and spoyled the Countries, thereby causing a great and vncertaine feare: himselfe with a picked army, whereunto he added of the valiantest Brytains, came to the mountaine Grampius, whereon his enemies had encamped, (for the Brytaines nothing quailed by the successe of the former encounter, and expecting nothing but a reuenge, or bondage, learning at length, that common danger is onelie to be resisted with common consent) by leagues and embassages had stirred vp the mindes of all the Cities about. Nowe were there to be in armes thirtie thousand and vpwarde, vnto which number, the youth, and all such as were of strong and lustie yéeres, euerie man bearing his tokens of praise about him, continually repayred from all sides. When amongst many other Captains, Calgacus a man both in nobilitie and valor aboue the rest, spake to the assemblie in this manner: As often as I behold the causes of this warre and our necessitie, my minde giueth me great hope, that this day and your mutuall consent sent shall be the beginning of libertie to all Brytaine; for, euery one of you hauing tried seruitude, and hauing no other land nor sea, which can saue vs (the Romanes nauie being at our elbowes) the verie warre and weapons which are the honour of the worthie, must be the onlie safetie of the faint-hearted. With these and manie such reasons drawne from the calamitie of their future seruitude, the pride and tyrannie of their gouernors, the fickle friendship of the strangers serving in their enemies campe, ready to change vpon any high occasion, and the present remedie of al misery, which, as he said in the beginning, was onely valiantie, he so stirred vp all mens minds, that they applauded his Oration after their manner, with songs and diuers kind of noises. This Oration being ended, as also Agricola his speech to his Souldiours, the two armies beganne to encounter. Agricola placed his battailes in this order: he made his maine battaile of the strangers (his aides) which were in number viii. thousand, on each side whereof, for winges he placed his horsemen to the number of three thousand, and his legions he caused to guarde the trenches of his Campe, that if it were possible, the victorie might be gained without the shedding of Roman bloud, or if his main battaile were broken, they might be gathered againe, and the fight restored by his legions. The battaile of the Brytaines (to terrifie their enemies, as also to make their brauest shewe,) stood on higher ground, so as their vawarde being come vpon the plaine, the rest were on the forte of the hill, their Chariots, in the meane time galloping vp and downe the fielde, making great shoutes and cries. Then Agricola perceiuing the number of his enemies to bee greater then his owne, and fearing to be charged both on the face and flanke of his battaile at one time, and that manie thought necessarie to haue the legions aduanced forwarde, remained notwithstanding firme in his first resolution, causing his battaile to bee somewhat drawne in length, himselfe alighted from his horse, and stoode on foote before his standards. The first fight was with shotte of arrowes and dartes, during which time, the Brytaines, both skilfullie and couragiouslie with their huge Swords and small Bucklers, either bare or brake the Romanes shotte, and answered them with an infinite number of the like, vntill Agricola was perswaded by bands of Hollanders, and Brabanders, that the matter might be brought to swords and hand-strokes, which kinde of fight they were acquainted withall, by long haunting the wars, and the same was verie incommodious for their enemies, bearing but small shieldes, and vnmeasurable swordes: For the pointlesse swordes of the Brytains, were vnfit for a throng, and where they wanted roome. Wherefore the Hollanders straike thicke together, and thrust them ouer the Bucklers, wounding them in the faces, and hauing broken that battaile, passed forward towarde them which kept the hill, which seene by the rest of the Romanes bandes, they partly moued by enuie of the others glorie, and partlie by heate of their owne courages, cutte in pieces those that they first encountred, leauing notwithstanding, some halfe dead, and others not touched, for haste to obtaine a perfect victorie. In the meane while, the troupes of the Brytaine horsemen, did take their flight, but the Chariots put themselues pecemeale among the foote bandes, which kinde

of fight, (at first) seemed somewhat terrible to their enemies, but it long serued not their turnes, being assayled with a thicke preasse of their enemies, and the grounde not commodious for the Chariots, nor their riders all of the best. So as at the last, their Chariot horses, coursing vp and downe the fielde without guiders, ouerranne many of their owne companie, as they fled for feare from one place to another. The Brytaines, which all this while kept the hill, and came not to the fight, making little reckoning of the small number of the Romanes, beganne by little and little to descend, intending to hemme them in, in the middest of their conquest, which surely they had done, if Agricola, suspecting the same, had not dispatched foure companies of horsemen (which he kept for all sodaines) to encounter with them, who, the more fiercely they assailed, so much the more sharpely repulsed them, and sent them to flight: whereupon the deuice of the Brytaines turned to their owne harme. Moreouer, by Agricola his commandement the winges of the horsemen were taken from the front of his battell, and were made to charge vpon the battell of his enemies, standing ouer-against them. Then might you behold in the open fielde, a grieuous and lamentable spectacle, some followed the chase, some toke prisoners, and after killed them to take others. Now the enemies as euerie one thought best, fledde, some in heapes and armed fled from a smaller number: other, though vnarmed, tarryed and were slaine: euerie where lay weapons, carkasses, and lyms cut off, the ground all bloudie: sometime the vanquished approching neare to Woods, would make head, and entrappe the heedelesse followers, so as, if Agricola had not caused certaine lustie bandes in the manner of a search, and also diuers horsemen, leauing their horse where the Woods were thicke, and other on horsebacke, where the Woods would suffer, to raunge them all about, there might haue béene some detriment receiued by too much hardinesse. But when the Brytaines saw themselues pursued in order of battaile, they toke againe their flight, not in companies as before, nor tarrying one for another, but here and there, euen as men glad to escape, sought long and by wales. Night and wearinesse of slaughter ended the chase. There were slaine of the Brytaines about tenne thousand: of the Romane armie, three hundred and fortie, among whom Aulus Atticus, Captaine of a bande, whome the heate of his youth, and courage of his horse brought into the hands of his enemies. That night the victors made merrie with the spoile, but the Brytaines wandring vp and downe, men and women lamenting together, relieued and fetcht away their hurt men, assembled together the whole, forsoke their houses, and for anger set fire on them, choosing themselues lurking places, which straight they forsoke againe: sometime conceiuing good hope, which straightway quayled againe: and some were knowen to kill their wiues and children, as though they had therein taken compassion vpon them. The next day made the victorie more manifest, in which there was nothing but silence, the hils being then forsaken, and also the houses smoaking a farre off.

Agricola sending abroad his espialles, coulde finde no enemie to make head, wherefore Sommer being too farre spent to proceede any further in the warre, hee had his Souldiours into the coastes of the Horesti, and there taking hostages, caused his naute to coaste about Brytaine, which at last arriued at the Hauen called Trutulensis, afterwarde hauing bestowed his souldiours in their wintering places, departed Brytaine, and left the prouince in quiet to his successour.

First Christians in Brytain. Nicephorus.

Diuers authors affirme, that about this time, the Gospell of Christ our sauiour was first preached in this Iland. Nicephorus a Greeke author in his second booke the 40. Chapter, hath as followeth. Simon borne in Cana Galilei, who for his feruent affection to his Master, & great zeale he toke by all meanes to the Gospell, was surnamed Zelotes, he hauing receiued the holy Ghost from aboue, trauailed through Aegypt and Affrike, then through Mauritania and all Lybia, preaching the Gospel. And the same Doctrine he brought to the Occidentall sea, and the Iles called Brytaniæ, &c. And in the third Booke the first Chapter, he saith. The holie Apostles (like as we haue declared alreadie) being dispersed throughout the whole earth, did diuide the prouinces amongst them by lot, to preach the Gospell in. Peter vndoubtedly first at Ierusalem, then in Galatia, Bythinia, with the higher Asia, Cappadocia, and all Italie, taught the Gospell: Iohn in Asia, who ended his life there: To Andrew fell the Prouinces on the coaste of Euxine, all Scythia, Byzans, Macedonia, and the firme land of Greece: Thomas amongst the Parthians, Indians, and the Ile of Taproban did publish the Gospell: Another chose Aegypt and Lybia: another the vttermost coastes of the Ocean, with the Iles of Brytaine, &c. Dorotheus writeth thus. Simon Zelotes passing through Mauritania, and Affrica preached Christ, at length was crucified, slaine and buried in Brytaine, or rather Bythania. Also he saith, Aristobulus, whom the Apostle to the Romans remembreth, was made a Bishop in Brytaine or Bythania. George Maior writeth in a preface, that immediatlie after Christs resurrection vnder Claudius the Emperor, the light of the gospel was kindled in Brytaine by Ioseph of Arimathea that buried the body of Christ. Tertullian writing against the Iewes of those times, saith: The Brytaines inhabitants of places vnknowen to the Romanes, yet did obey and were subiect to the kingdome of Christ. William of Malmesbury, in his booke of the antiquities of Glastenburie, alleageth Freculphus to write in his second booke and fourth Chapter, as followeth: Philip the Apostle, preaching the worde of God in Gaule (nowe called Fraunce) chose out xii. amongste his Disciples, whome hee sent into Brytaine to preach the worde of life, and vpon euerie one of them, he most deuoutly stretched out his right hande: ouer these he appointed for chiefe, his deare friende Ioseph of Arimathea, that buried our Lorde. These (saieth Iohn Capgraue, who alleageth Melkin and Merlin) came into this lande the yeare of Christes incarnation sixtie three, in the time of Aruiragus who gaue to them the Ile of Aualon, where they builded an Oratorie of wrythen wandes, and after there were buried: which place being since encreased, and newely builded by diuers Princes, was named Glastenburie. For confirmation whereof, King Henry the second (as himselfe in his Charter affirmeth) hauing diligentlie perused the Priuiledges and Charters, which hee caused to bee presented and read, Epistle of Eluther ius to Lucius king of Brytaine. Lib. Consti. Lon.

The yeare after Christes birth 202. Pope Eluther ius did write to Lucius king of Brytain, for the amendment of the kings and the nobility of Brytain as followeth. You required that we should send you the Roman and Imperiall lawes, ý you might vse thē in your kingdome of Brytain, but those lawes we may dispense, & not the lawes of God. You haue receiued lately through Gods godnesse in your kingdome, the faith and law of Christ, you haue there in your kingdome both Testaments, out of them by Gods grace, and the aduice of your realme take a lawe, and thereby patiently gouerne the kingdome. You are the Vicar of God in your kingdome, according to the kingly Prophet. The earth is the Lordes, and his fulnesse is the whole world, and all that dwell therein: and againe, Thou hast loued righteousnesse, and hated iniquitie, therefore God (euen thy God) hath annointed thee with the oyle of gladnesse aboue thy fellowes. They are the kings children, christian nations, and people of your kingdome that liue and consist vnder your protection, peace, and kingdome according to the Scripture, as an Hen gathereth her chickens vnder her wings, the people, and nations of the kingdome of Brytaine is yours, such as are diuided you should gather them together to the lawe of Christ: his holy Church, to peace and concorde: and cherish, maintaine, protect, gouerne, and defend them from the iniurious, malicious and their enemies. Lucius 177. Eleutherius Bp of Rome

Lucius raigned xii. yéeres, and was buried at Glocester.

181 Dion. COmodus after his father Antonius Philosophus succéeded in the Empire with most cruell tyrannie. In his time the Northerne Brytaines burst in through the wall, forraged the Countrey, and slew the Romane Generall with his souldiers, wherefore Vlpius Marcellus was appointed here a carefull vigilant Captaine: he sore annoied the Brytaines, which were enemies to the Roman state, and purchasing ennie by his vertue, was shortly dismissed.

Lampridius Dion. Then Ceronnis who ruled all vnder Comodus, appointed certaine men of base estate to gouerne the Romane enemies here, wherewith the souldiours being grieued, sent 15000. chosen men out of their number to Rome, who accusing him before Comodus to compasse the Empire, for his sonne, was deliuered vnto them, who immediately mangled him and slew his wife with his two sonnes.

Lampridius. Comodus then sent Holnius Pertinax into Brytaine, and surnamed himselfe Brytanicus thereunto perswaded by flatterers, when the Brytaines were so euill affected toward him, that they would haue nominated some other Emperour against him, and namely Pertinax: but these tumults were appeased by the wisedome of Pertinax, to his great danger, for he was well néere slaine in tumult, and left among the dead, which iniury he after seuerally reuenged, and sued for his discharge, being afterward preferred to the Empire.

Capitolinus. Capitolinus. Clodius Albinus was then sent hither by Comodus, who at the first so greatly estéemed of him, that he honored him with the title of a Cæsar, which Clodius refused: but afterwards when a false rumor was dispersed, that Comodus was slaine, hee made an Oration to the legions of Brytaine, impeaching the gouernment of Emperors, and preferring the Senate, whereupon Comodus being sharpned against him, sent Iunius Seuerus to rule here, and shortlie after Comodus was slaine.

194 Victor Bp of Rome. PErtinax then was chosen Emperour, and within iii. monethes was slaine through the perswasions of Didius Iulianus, who enioyed the Empire two moneths, and the practise of Clodius Albinus, which then returned into Brytain, and (as it séemeth) recouered his former gouernment.

194 197. S. Gouernment persecution SEuerus after the death of Pertinax was saluted Emperor: he immediately slewe Didius Iulianus, and because he feared Clodius Albinus with his Brytaine legions, he created him Cæsar, and partaker of the Empire, and sent Heraclitus to gouerne this Ile: but after he had subdued Niger who also vsurped the Empire, he moued warre against Albinus, who passing hence into France with the Brytish armie, encountred with Seuerus neare Lions, and was there slaine. Henceforth Seuerus quietly enioyed the Romane Empire, and made sharpe warres into the Easterne partes of the world, with great glorie.

209 209. Zephyrinus Bp of Rome. But returning to Rome, he vnderstood of a warre raised in Brytaine. Wherfore he hasted hither with his two sonnes Bassianus and Geta: at his arriuall peace was offered, which he refused, and leauing his yonger sonne Geta to gouerne the prouince, (being the hither part of the Ile) he with Bassianus his eldest sonne entred into the North, & passed the further part of this Iland without any resistance: yet by ambushes, difficulties of the waie, and other inconuenfences, he loſt 50000. men, and then returned, enforced the enemies to conclude a league, and yéld ſome part of their Countrey.

At concluſion of which league, when hee and his ſonne rid to treat with the Caledonians or Northerne Brytaines, Baſſianus his ſonne drawing his ſworde in the ſight of the enemie, was ready to haue ſlaine him, and had done it, had not ſome of the companie made an outcrie: yet this fault was remitted.

After this league, the Brytaines of the North reſorted to the Emperours Court, where Iulia, Seuerus wife, obiected to a woman of Brytaine, the wife of Argentorix the Caledonian, that the Brytiſh women accompanied with men diſhoneſtly: yea quoth the Brytiſh woman, wee ſatiſfie the naturall luſt in better ſort then you Romanes, for wee accompanie our ſelues openlie with the beſt men, and you commit adulterie cloſely with the moſt vile perſons. But after this league there was a generall reuolte of the Brytaines againſt the Romanes, which yet was pacified with great ſlaughter, and then hee built a wall of turfe, to inhibite the Northerne Brytaines, from whence when hee returned, at the next lodging, a blacke Moore that ſerued him, a notable ſcoffer, met him with a Crowne of Cypres: he moued with the colour of the man, and the Cypres (which was then vſed at all burials,) as with ſignes of euill lucke, commanded the man to be ſent awaie, wherewith he cried: Thou haſt béene all in all, and haſt vanquiſhed all, and now of a Conqueror be thou a God. Then comming to the Citie of Yorke (as is ſuppoſed,) he was by miſtaking brought to the Temple of Bellona: blacke beaſts alſo being ordained for ſacrifice, followed him home to his pallace: which things theſe did then accompt to be ominous. Seuerus wal. Spartianus.

Shortly after he departed out of this life at Yorke, partly through ſickneſs, and partly through griefe conceiued of his ſonnes euill demeanour. At his laſt gaſpe he vttered theſe words: I found the ſtate troubleſome enerie where, and leaue it quiet euen vnto the Brytaines.

Herodian writeth that in theſe warres of Seuerus againſt the North Brytaines, he found their Countrey full of watery Marſhes: by thoſe Marſhes did the Brytains ſwim and ſkirmiſh with their enemies, being couered with water vp vnto the Nauell, not caring that men ſawe the priuie parts of their naked bodies. Neither did they know the vſe of apparell, but accuſtomed to compaſſe their bellies and necks onlie with yron, which they eſtéemed an ornament and token of riches, as other barbarous people ſuppoſed of Golde. They painted their bodies with diuers pictures and formes of beaſts, and therefore ware no garment, leaſt the painting ſhould be hidden, being a nation very valiant, and warlike, gréedie of ſlaughter, and content onely with a ſmall target, a ſpeare, and a ſkain hanging by their naked ſides, ignorant of the vſe of ſhirts of maile and helmets, for they reckned the ſame comberous vnto them, when they ſhould ſwimme ouer the lakes, &c. Herodian.

A grieuous diſeaſe came vpon Seuerus, being ſore appalled with age, ſo that he was conſtrained to kéepe his chamber and ſend Antonius vnto the warres: but Antonie not regarding the buſineſſe of Brytaine, endeuoured by all meanes he coulde, to win the hearts of the ſouldiers vnto him, depriuing his brother, to the intent they ſhould onely aide him to the attaining of the ſoueraignte. The long maladie of his father, cauſed him to perſwade Phyſitions to rid the old man out of the worlde, vntill that Seuerus, being conſumed, ended his life, who was the moſt famous of all Emperours in warlike affaires: For none other had obtained ſo manie victories and conqueſts, either ciuill againſt his aduerſaries, or forraine againſt the barbarous nations. Thus deceaſſed hee, after hee had gouerned the Empire the ſpace of xviii. yéeres, leauing his ſons for ſucceſſours in the ſame: vnto whome he leſte alſo great abundance of riches, as none of his predeceſſours had before him done. When Antony had gotten the ſupreme authoritie, he put to death the Phiſitions, becauſe they obeyed not his commandement in haſtning his fathers death: and ſlewe all his owne and his brothers bringers vp and inſtructers, for that they went about to reconcile them, leauing none aliue, that was either of dignitie, or had reuerenced his Father. The Captaines of the armie hee enticed, to perſwade the ſouldiours to proclaime him onely Emperour: imagining dailie manifold miſchiefes againſt his brother: but hee could not win the ſouldiours good willes. Wherefore Antony, hauing taken truce with the Britaines, remoued towardes his mother and brother. Their mother laboured to bring them to agreement, wherein alſo many prudent counſellours earneſtly trauelled, Antony thereby was induced, rather of force, then good will, to counterfaite loue. After which done, the two brethren gouerning the Empire with equall honour, launched out of Britaine, and ſailed with the reliques of their Father toward Rome. For when they had burned the bodie (as was the cuſtome of the Romanes) they carried the aſhes, intermedled with pleaſant odours, in a Bore of Alabaſter) to Rome, that it might bee there interred amongſt the monuments of other Princes. Themſelues led thus their armie, as conquerours of Britaine, and paſſed ouer the Ocean vnto the nert coaſt of France, and ſo haſted towards Rome. When they were entred into Rome, all the people crowned with Laurell, receiued, and the Senate welcommed them. Formoſt road the Emperors themſelues, clothed in Emperiall purple. And next vnto them followed the Conſuls bearing the veſſell with Seuerus reliques. Which veſſell, the people, after they had ſaluted the new Emperour, did reuerently worſhip. The Emperours and Conſuls being thus accompanied with Princely pompe, caried the ſame into the Temple, where the diuine monuments of Marcus, and other Emperours are ſéene. After they had finiſhed the ſolemne ſacrifice, and according to the auncient vſage, celebrated the Funerall ceremonies, both the brethren departed into the Emperiall pallace: which they deuided betwéene them, cloſed vp all backe doores, and priuie poſternes, and met together only at the outer gates. They choſe beſides either of them vnto himſelfe a ſundrie guarde, and neuer came together vnleſſe it were ſomtime for a little while to be ſéene of the people. Neuertheles, firſt of all, they accompliſhed the due Funerals of their father. For the Romans accuſtome to conſecrate with immortalitie, ſuch Emperours, as at their death, leaue either children, or ſucceſſours in the Empire behinde them. And thoſe which are endued with that honour, they canonize amongſt the Gods. There is through the Citie, a certaine dolefull lamentation, mixed with fearefull soie. And they vse to interre the dead corpes verie sumptuously. But then, they haue an Image, made as like the dead Emperor, as may be. The same, within the porch of the Emperiall Pallace, they laie in a great and high bedde of Ivorie, couered ouer with cloth of golde. The same Image loketh verie pale, like a diseased patient. About the bed on either side, a great part of the daie, do certaine persons sit: that is to wit, on the left side, the Senate, clothed in blacke garments: and on the right side, many matrons. None of these are séene to weare any owches, or chaines of gold, but being clad with thin white vestures, they shewe the countenance of mourners. And thus doe they continue the space of 7. daies: during the which, euery day the Emperors Phisitions do repaire vnto the bedde, and, as though they had felt the patients pulses, declare that hee wareth more sicke then before. Finally, when it séemeth that hee is deceased, certaine of the most noble and worthy young men, of the orders of knightes and Senators, doe take vp the bedde on their shoulders, and carrie it through the stréete, called Sacra via, vnto the olde market place, where the Romane Magistrates are accustomed to render vp their offices. There on both sides, are certaine stages made with steps, vpon the which, on the one side, is a quire of boies, being noble mens sonnes; and on the other side are many beautifull women, singing hymnes and ballades, in praise of the dead Emperour, measured with diuers lamentable verses. When these are finished, the young men doe take vp the bed againe, and beare it out of the Citie, into the field called Campus Martius, in the broadest part whereof, there is erected a Tower foure square, with sides of equall height builded of great tymber, like vnto a Tabernacle. The same within forth, is filled with drie chippes and rédes: and on the outer side, it is hanged with Arras clothes of golde, and decked with Images of Ivorie, and sundrie painted pictures. Within it also, is an other lesse Towre, but like in forme, with doores and portalles opened. And ouer that, the third and fourth, with manie other romes ascending continually, vntill they reach vnto the highest, which is lesse then all the other. A man may compare this building vnto Towres, which are set in Hauens with fire on the toppes, to direct shippes which saile by night on the Seas, into their perfect portes. The same are commonlie called Phari. Now when they haue put the bed in the second Tabernacle, they gather al kinds of spices and perfumes, with diuers odoriferous fruites, hearbes and iuyces, the which they throwe on heapes in the tabernacle. Neither is there anie Nation, Citie, or person, which excelleth in honour or dignitie, but at that time will to the vttermost of his power, most honourably celebrate the last funeralles of the Emperour.

When they haue couched a great heape of spices together, and stuffed the building therewith, all the Roman knights do ride about the Tower, with a iust course and order to and fro: Chariots are also drawne about, wherein many do sit clothed in purple, representing the persons of al noble men being magistrates and captaines of Rome.

The ceremonies being throughly ended, the successor in the Empire, taketh a brand

a brand of fire in his hand, and fireth therewith the tabernacle. After whome, all other that are present, do throwe fire likewise into the same. And immediatly, all the building being filled with those drie sticks and spices, beginneth to burne vehemently. Then out of the highest and least towre, as out of a high steeple, is let forth an Eagle, the which they beléeue, doth beare the Emperours soule into heauen. And from thencefoorth is that Emperour worshipped as the other gods.

Carausius was appointed to bee admirall of the Brytaine seas, which were sore troubled by the pirates of the Frankes and Saxons: but when he had oftentimes apprehended the pirates, and neither reserued the prizes, or was accomptable for it, neither to the Emperours, nor their deputies, it was suspected, ỳ of set purpose hee permitted those rouers to haue recourse through those seas, to the end hee might rifle them, and enrich himselfe. Maximianus therefore sent part of his armie to suppresse him, in which were manie of the Thebane legion, who in this iourny were slaine by his commandement, and made Martires, because they professed Christ. Carausius vnderstanding of the preparation made against him, passed out of Gaule into Brytaine, where bringing the countrie to his obeysance, he vsurped the roabe of an Emperour: whereupon they which were sent to surprise him, returned to Maximianus, who then was incumbred with newe warre in Gaule. In the meane time Carausius built shippes in Brytaine, intercepted certaine companies of souldiours, assembled a great number of barbarous people with spoyle, with hope of whome he purposed to trouble the sea coasts of Gallia and Spaine. Then purposed Maximianus the second time to make warre against Carausius, but by stormy weather, and want of Pilotes, he was enforced to defer his purpose. Shortelie after, the two Emperours elected two Cæsars, Valerius Maximus, and Constantius Chlorus, to which Constantius they committed the recouery of Brytaine. He immediatly passing through Gaule hitherward, soudenly surprised Gessoriacum (now called Bullein) which Carausius had manned, and so stopped the hauen, that it could stand Carausius in no steade. Then building Shippes to passe ouer hither, hee first assayled luckilie the Hollanders, which had reuolted to Carausius, and then staying for conueneient winde, hee houered a while on the sea coast, and in the meane time Carausius was traiterously slaine by Alectus his familiar friend. 287. In this fight none of the Romanes perished, but here all the field was ouerspread with dead bodies of the enimies, among whome lay Alectus himselfe without anie Emperiall ornaments, and scantlie knowne. Other Romane souldiours also which had lost their company in the mist, arriued at London, where in the Citie a great number of barbarous people which escaped from the battaile, and purposed to haue sacked London. Then when Constantius came a land, the Brytaines with their wiues & children flocked vnto him, and submitted themselues joifullie, being nowe deliuered out of a long thraldome. This expedition of Constantius into Brytaine is ascribed by some to Maximianus, into which error, a false inscription of the Panegyriks hath led them.

296 As Asclepiodatus hauing recouered Brytaine, as is before touched, he beleaguered the Citie of London with a strong siege (saieth Geffrey Monmouth) and ere it were long by knightlie force and violence, entred the Citie, and slew the Romans Captain named Liuius Gallus, nere vnto a broke there at that time running, into the which broke he threw him, by reason whereof it is called in Brytish Nant Gallon, since in the Saxon tongue Gallus or Wallus broke, and to this day the streete where sometime the broke ran, is called Walbroke. The Romane Histories speake nothing of this Gallus, but of Galerius, which was ioined in the empire with Constantius, after the decease of Asclepiodatus, & also of the Brytish king Coill, as shal be shewed in place conuenient. True it is I grant, that a certaine broke, dreined, I know not from what heads, but much encreased by the moorish groundes, without the Citie of London on the North side, passed through the same Citie southward to the riuer of Thames. And therefore of comming through and from the wall, and so through the Citie, was since called Wallbrooke: which brooke in olde time had diuers places, Bridges ouer it, as appeareth by inquisition made in Anno. 1300. Elius Russell being Maior of London, William Iordane, and I. de Beuer then Maisters of those Bridges founde, who were bound to repaire them so oft as neede, and then was the same broke vaulted ouer with brick, as it now remaineth.

Constantine the Emperour, being certified hereof, deuised with himselfe which waies possible he might ridde the Romanes from vnder this grieuous yoke of seruitude, and dispatch the Tyrant out of this life: Deliberating thus with himselfe, he forecasted also what God he were best to call vpon for aide to wage battaile with the aduersarie. He remembred how that Diocletian, which wholy dedicated himselfe vnto the seruice of ẏ Hethenish Gods, preuailed nothing therby: also he perswaded himselfe for certaine, ẏ his father Constantius, who renounced the Idolatrie of the Gentiles led a more fortunate life, musing thus doubtfully with himselfe, and taking his iourney with his souldiers, I wot not whither, a certaine vision appeared vnto him, as it was strange to beholde, so in deede incredible to be spoken of. About noone, the date somewhat declining, he saw in the skie, a light some Pillar in forme of a Crosse, wherein these woordes were ingrauen: In this ouercome. The which Vision so amazed the Emperour, that he mistrusting his owne sight, demanded of them that were present, whether they perceiued the Vision: which when all with one consent had affirmed, the wauering mind of the Emperour was settled, with this deuine and wonderfull sight. The night following in his sleepe, hee seeth Christ, which saith thus vnto him: Frame vnto thy selfe the forme of a Crosse after the example of the signe which appeared vnto thee, and beare the same against the enemies, as a fit banner or token of victorie: He being fully perswaded with this oracle, commandeth the victorious signe of the Crosse (which as yet is reserued in the pallace of the Emperour) to be made, and therewith procéedeth forwards with great courage, and ioyning with the enemie, right ouer against Rome, about the bridge commonlie called Vulbia, hee got the victorie, for Maxentius being drowned in the riuer died: it was the seauenth yéere of his raigne, when he ouercame Maxentius. After these thinges, when as Lucinius his fellow Emperour, and his brother in lawe, hauing married his sister Constantia, led his life in the East: Constantine enioying ample benefites receiued at the handes of God, shewed himselfe gratefull in offering of thankes and praises vnto the author of all goodnes, his practises were these. To deliuer the Christians from persecution: to call againe ẏ exiled vnto their natiue soile: to set at libertie such as were in prison: to restore againe the goods of the confiscated, to build againe the Churches that were ouerthrowne: all which things he accomplished with great promptnesse of minde. But Licinius persecuting the Christians, Constantine waged battaile against him, & meeting oft by Sea and land, in the end, at Chrisopolis a Citie of Bithinia, to witte at the Hauen of Chalcedon, Licinius was ouercome, and yéeldeth himselfe to Constantine.

After hee had repressed the ciuill warres, vanquished the Gothes in manie places, and woon great memorie among the Barbarians, he placed the Brytaines that had done him so good seruice, in a part of France towards the west shore of the Ocean, hee applied himselfe wholy to the studie of the liberall Artes. He summoned the Nicene Councell, which was holde at Nices, a Citie of Bythinia, for the debating of the controuersie about the feast of Easter, & the rooting out of the heresie of Arius. Which Councell being ended, he liued in great tranquilitie and turned himselfe wholy to the building of Churches, as well in other Cities as in that Citie which he called after his owne name, Constantinople. In this Citie he erected from the foundation two Churches calling the one of Peace, the other of the Apostles.

Helena the Emperours mother (which of the village Drepane made a Citie, the which afterwards the Emperour called Helenopolis) tooke her iournie to Jerusalem, which when she found lying waste in a heape of stones, she searched diligently for the Sepulture of Christ, and at length she found it, but with great difficultie; for as they which imbraced the faith of Christ, highly esteemed of that Sepulchre and monument after his passion: so such as abhorred Christian Religion, heaped in that place much earth, and raised great hillocks, and builded there the Temple of Venus, and set vp her Idoll. But when the Emperours mother was made priuie thereunto, she threw downe the Idoll: caused the great heape of earth to bee hurled downe, where vnder thee found three Crosses in the graue, one vpon the which Christ suffered: other two, whereon the two theeues ended their liues, together with the table of Pilate, wherein he had written that Christ was crucified king of the Iewes: the Emperors mother builded ouer the Sepulchre a gorgious Church, calling it New Jerusalem, right ouer against that olde and waste Jerusalem. She builded a second Church nothing inferiour to the first, at Bethelem in the hollow rocke, where Christ was borne. Also the third, vpon the mount, where Christ ascended vnto the Father, manie things she gaue to Churches, and to poore people, she liued godlie and religiously, and departed this life being fourescore yeares olde: her bodie was buried at Constantinople. Aelius Lampridius Hor

About this time Octauius, whome Constantine had left gouernour in Brytaine, rebelled, against whome Constantine sent Traherne with a legion of Romans, who (after diuers conflictes) was slaine: Gracianus surnamed Funarius was at that time gouernour of the Roman legion in Brytaine.

Constantine at the age of 65. yeares died, and was buried at Constantinople, he left behinde him three sonnes, to wit Constantinus, Constance, and Constantius, to succéede him in the Empire.

Constantinus

337 CONstantinus beganne his Empire and raigne ouer Brytaine: with him his Father Constantine had appointed by his last will, that his two brethren Constans and Constantius should participate and haue their portion of the Empire, but not long after, when Constantinus attempted warre against his brother at Aquileia, and demeaned himselfe vnaduisedly therin, he was slaine, and then was the Empire reduced vnder the gouernment of the two brethren onlie.

340 CONstans then ruled Brytaine, which he administred with great iustice: but after, when he failed of his health, he associated vnto him in stéed of friends, euill disposed persons to assist him, through whose euill counsell he declined into horrible vices, by meane whereof, waxing scant tolerable of the inhabitants of the prouinces, he was slaine by Magnentius, who vsurped the Empire in France, Spaine and Brytaine.

352. Liberius I Bp. of Rome.

353 CONstantius then had the regiment of Brytaine, who sent hither a Spaniard called Paul, a Notarie by profession, to bring out certaine men of warre which had conspired with Magnentius: but he vpon false surmises grieuously molested the guiltlesse, fettering and manacling whome he pleased. Whereupon Martinus then lieutenant in Brytaine, being moued with compassion, desired him to forbeare the harmlesse: but he was so rigorous, that he also charged Martinus himselfe of conspiracie with Magnentius, and was earnest to bring him before the Emperour: whereupon Martinus drawing his sworde smote at him, and because he could not slaie him, he sodainly sleiwe himselfe, and this Paul embrued with blood, haled a great company (linked in chaines) to the Emperours presence, which were either banished, executed, or attainted.

Constantius after this appointed Iulianus to gouerne Gaule, at which time great spoile was made in Brytaine by the Scottes and Pictes, wherefore Iulianus busied with warre against the Almaines, sent Lupcinus hither with an army, in whose absence Iulianus vsurped the Empire: whereof when Constantius heard, he returned from the war (against the Parthians) against Iulianus, and died in the way.

362 IVlianus (called the Apostata) began his raigne ouer Brytaine and the Empire, a man séene passing wel in the Liberall Sciences, but an earnest aduersarie of Christian religion: he banished Palladius a great and honorable person into Brytaine vpon a suspition: he sent Alipius who had béene a lieutenant of Brytaine to repaire Ierusalem, but terrible flashes & fire issuing out of the earth, when they laide the foundations, enforced them to leaue their purpose. This Iulian with great preparations made warre vpon the Parthians, he spoiled Assiria, and returning from thence a Conquerour, he was slaine by his enemies, as he prealed vnaduisedly into the battels. After him succéeded in the Empire Iouinian, and held it nine moneths.

MAximus a valiant and worthy man, was shortly after forced here in Brytaine to take the Empire vpon him, who passed into France, and immediatly al the Germane legions and Roman souldiors revolted vnto him from Gratian, so that he being destitute of men of warre, fled to Lions, where he was slaine by treason: for Maximus gaue out that Gratians wife was comming to her husband, which Gratian entirelie loving his wife, lightly credited, and therefore accompanied with a fewe, went forth to mete her: but in the coach where he supposed to haue founde his wife, was Andragatius a desperate man, who leaping out of the coach killed Gratian. 383 Egl Macedonius

Then Maximus created his sonne Victor a Cæsar, and vsed some cruelties against Gratians Captaines. Valentinian being herewith terrified, sent S. Ambrose vnto him to treat a peace, which he accepted, and Theodosius permitted him to vse the title of Augustus. Then he setled himselfe at Treir in Germanie, empouerished the Countries round about him, executed certain heretikes called Priscillianists, and then entred into Italy, breaking the peace, & thought to haue intercepted Valentinian, but he with his mother fled to Theodosius, and perswaded him to take reuenge of Maximus. In the meane time Maximus came to Aquileia, all Italie and Affrica submitted themselues vnto him, when sodainly Theodosius comming from Constantinople, moued warre against him, corrupted his souldiours with bribes, and after one or two skirmishes inforced Maximus to flee to Aquileia, where his owne souldiours deliuered him to Theodousi, by whose commandement he was shortlie after beheaded. Andragatius also who kept the seas, vnderstanding this, drowned himselfe, and Victor the sonne of Maximus was slaine in France by Arbogustes. The Brytaines which serued him returned into France, and setled them in the country there, which is now called Brytaine, so was Brytaine recouered againe to the Romane Empire. Sigebertus

Then Constantine, a souldier of base estate, onely vpon confidence of his name, was elected here Emperour, who passing hence into France, with all the youth of Britain, got al the men of warre there to take part with him. Then Constantine fortified the Alpes and Rhene with garrisons, sent Constans his sonne (whom of a Monke hee had made a Cæsar) with a great armie into Spaine, where he toke, and afterward slewe certaine noble personages allied to Honorius, and returning to his father, left Gerontius to governe Spaine. Constantine himselfe then craued pardon of Honorius for vsurping the Empire, saying, that he did it by compulsion, which when Honorius heard, he so well liked of him, that he sent an Imperiall robe vnto him.

421. Boniface I Bp of Rome

In these troubles Britaine was greatly endangered by Picts and Scots, and sued to Honorius for succour, but he sending them onely Letters, willed them to loke to their owne state. Shortly after Constans, that was Monke, was slaine by Gerontius his owne Captaine, at Vienna in France: and Constantine himselfe being besieged at Arles by Honorius Souldiours, entered into holy orders, and fled into the Church, thinking thereby to saue himselfe, but was drawen out from thence, and slaine. Gerontius who had trayterously killed his master, was beset round about with Spaniards in his lodging, wherefore he first slew Allanus his tried friend, then Nunichia his wife, and lastly himselfe, and now Honorius recouered Britaine. In his time (saith Bede) Rome was destroied of the Gothes, the 1164. yere after it was builded: after which time the Romans left off to rule in Britain, almost 470. yeres after that Iulius Cæsar first entred the said Ile. The Romanes dwelt within the trench, which as we haue saide, Seuerus drewe ouerthwart the Iland at the south part, which thing may appeare by the cities, temples, bridges, and paued streets to this day remaining, notwithstanding they had in possession, vnder their dominion the farther parts of Britaine, and also the Ilands which are about Britaine. By meanes (as is aforesaid) the Romans had vsed to transport with the mouer into France the floure of al the youth of Britaine, to serue them in their forraine wars, their men of war were consumed, and was not now able to defend themselues against the invasions of their enemies: wherupon many yeres together they they liued vnder the oppression of two most cruell nations, the Scots & Picts: which were of the circuite of Brytaine, but diuided from the land of Brytaine by two armes of the sea, running betwixt them, of the which one from the east sea, the other from the west, runneth in far and wide into the land, though they may one reake to the other. In the middle of the east creeke, there is a city builded called Guidi. Aboue the west creeke toward the right hand standeth a citte called Alcluith, which in their language is as much to say, as the rocke Cluith, for it standeth by a flood of the same name. The Brytaines then being thus afflicted by ỹ said nations, sent their embassadors with letters vnto Rome, with lamentable supplications, requiring of them aide and succour, promising their continuall fealty, so that they would rescue them against the oppression of their enemies: whereupon there was sent vnto them a legion of armed souldiours from Rome, which comming into the Iland, and encountring with the enemies, ouerthrew a great number of them, & draue the rest out of the frontires of the country, and so setting them at libertie, and free from the miserie with which they were before so grieuously ouercharged, counselled them to make a wall betweene the two seas, which might be of force to keepe out their euill neighbours: and that done, they returned home with great triumph. Now the Brytaines building the wall which they were bid to make, not of stone, as they were willed, but of turfe, as hauing none among them, that had skill therein, made it so slender, that it serued them to little purpose. This wall they made betweene the two armes or creekes of the sea, many miles long, that where the fence of the water lacked, there by the helpe of the trench they might keep their countrey from the breaking in of their enemies, of which piece of worke, there remaineth euen vnto this day most assured tokens yet to be seene. This trench beginneth about two miles from the monastery of Abercuring, in a place which in the Picts language is called Penuahil, and in English is called Panwelt, and running out west ward, is ended by the city Alcluith. But the former enemies, when they had once perceiued that the Romane legion was returned home againe, forthwith being set on land by boats, inuaded the borders, ouercame the country, and as it were beate downe all before them: whereupon Embassadors be sent againe to Rome, beseeching them they would not suffer their miserable Country to be vtterly destroyed. Againe, there is sent an other legion, which comming vpon a sodain, made a great slaughter of the enemies, & chased them ouer into their owne country. Then the Romanes tolde the Brytains, that it was not their ease to take any more such trauellous iournies for their defence, and therefore bade them to practise their armour themselues, and to learne to withstand their enemies.

They builded vp a wall of hard stone from sea to sea, right betweene the two Cities, which there were made to keepe out the enemie, in the selfe same place where Seuerus before had cast his trench, with publike and priuate charges: the Brytaines also putting to their helping hands, they then builded it eight foote broad, and twelue foote high, right as it were by a line, from east to west, as it doth to this day appeare, which being perfected, they giue the people straight warning to looke well to themselues, they teach them to handle their weapons, and instruct them in warlike feates. Also by the sea side southward, where their ships lay at harbor, least their enemies should land thereabouts, they made by bulwarks along, one somewhat distant from another: and this done, bid them fare well, as minded no more to returne. At this time almost all the treasure of Brytaine was hid under ground, or transported ouer into France.

As soone as they were gone, the Scots and Picts hauing intelligence that they had made promise they would come no more, they taking heart of grace, returne againe to their businesse: and first, all that was without the wall, they tooke for their owne. After that, they giue assault vnto the wall, where the Brytaines were with graples pulled downe, and otherwise so assaulted, that they leauing both the Cities and the wall also, were dispersed and put to flight, the enemies following, killed and slayed more cruellie then euer they did before, whereupon being driuen out of their owne houses, and possessions, they fall a robbing and spoyling one the other of them, so farre forth, that all the whole country was brought to that exigent, that they had none other sustenance, but that they got by hunting and killing of wilde beastes.

Pelagian heresie.

The Pelagian heresie being brought in by Agricola, the sonne of Severianus a Pelagian bishop, about this time did sore corrupt the faith of the Brytaines, but the Brytains being neither willing to receiue their lewd doctrine, as blasphemous against the grace of God, neither able to refute their wily and wicked persuasions, they deuised this wholsome counsell, to seeke for aide of the Bishops of France, against these their spiritual enemies. And they calling a common councell, consulted among themselues, whom of thē all it were best to send to help their neighbors faith. By the assent of them al there was chosen two worthy prelates, Germanus Altisiodorensis, and Lupus Bishop of the Citie Trecalla, which should passe ouer into Brytaine to confirme them in the faith, which with readie obedience accepting the commandement of the synode, tooke shipping thitherward, and had prosperous windes, which set them a shore in place where they themselues desired. Thither a great multitude of people being assembled, receiued the Epistles of God, and the worde of God was preached by them, not onely in their Churches, but also in the open stretes, and in the Countrey, in such sort, that in all places both the sound and faithfull were confirmed, and they that before swarued out of the right faith, were amended. The Authors and head professors of this hereticall errour, lay lurking all this while, and much spited to see the people daily to fall from them. After long aduisement vsed, they take vpon them to trie the matter by open disputation, which being agréed vppon, they come forth richly appointed, gorgeously apparelled, accompanyed with a number of flattering fauourers. The people were present both to sée and iudge the matter. The parties were farre vnlike of condition: on the one side was the faith, on the other, mans presumption: on the one side, meekenesse, on the other side, pride: on the one side, Pelagius, on the other, Christ. First of all Germanus and Lupus gaue their aduersaries leaue to speake, which vainely occupied both the time and eares of the people with naked wordes. But after the reuerend Bishoppes powred out their words confirmed with Scriptures out of the Gospelles and Apostles. Thus the vanitie of Heretikes was conuicted, and falsehood confuted, so that at euerie obiection, they were forced to confesse their errour, not being able to answere them: but after their departure, the heresie beganne againe to reuiue. Wherefore Germanus returned into Brytaine with Seuerus, banished the heretikes, and restored the faith. Pelagians heresie confuted.

Brytaines and Saxons.

THe Brytaines continued in doubtfull war with the Scots and Pictes, sometime bearing away the victorie, and sometime leauing it to the enemie. But considering the ambitious minds of men, and fearing least some should vsurpe the kingdome at home, while they were deteined with warres abroad, thought good to appoint ouer them some king: and so with one consent they elected Vortiger.

VOrtiger raigned in Brytaine, in whose time hunger more preuailing against the Brytaines, droue many of them to yéeld themselues vnto the hands of their enemies. Other there were which could neuer be brought thereunto, but from the hilles and brakes where they lurked, many times inuaded their enemies, as trusting so much the more in the helpe of God, how much the lesse hope they had of aide of men, and by such meanes, first of all both resisted and ouerthrew them, which many yeeres together had liued by the spoile of the Countrey, whereby for the time they drew homeward with shame enough, intending not long after to returne. 447

The Pictes then, and long time after, kept themselues quiet at home, saue onely they would nowe and then make inuasions into the lande, and driue away bootes of cattell. After that they drewe to a quietnesse, there ensued such plentie of graine as neuer was séene the like before, as farre as any man could remember, whereof the people grewe to lose and wanton liuing, whereof al manner of lewdnesse followed, specially crueltie, hate of trueth, and loue of lying, insomuch, that if any were gentler and more giuen to trueth then other, the other would worke him all the hurt and spite they could. This did not onely the Seculars, but also the Cleargie, and the heads thereof, giuing themselues ouer to drunkennesse, pride, contention, enuie, and such other, casting from them the yoke of Christ.

In the meane season, a bitter plague befell among them for their corrupt liuing, consuming in short time such a multitude of people, that the quicke were not sufficient to burie the dead: and yet for all that, the remnant remained so hardened in sinne, that neither their friendes death, nor feare of their owne, could cure the mattreine of their soules, which daily perished through their sinnefull liuing: whereby a great stroke of Gods vengeance ensued vpon the whole sinnefull nation: for being now infested againe with their old neighbours the Scottes and Pictes, they deuised with themselues what was best to doe, and where they might séeke rescue to withstand and repell the feare of the Northerne nation: and they agreed all with their king Vortiger, to demaund aide of the Saxons beyond the Seas, which thing doubtlesse (saith Bede) was done by Gods owne appointment, that the people might be thereby plagued, as by the ende it manifestly appeared.

449 Merouée K. of France.

The people of the English or Saxons, being sent for of the said king into Brytaine, landed here in three long ships, and by the kings commandement, were appointed to abide in the east part of the land. And the Ile of Thanet was giuen to them, they to defend their countrey like friends: but indéed, as it proued afterward, minding to destroy the Countrey as enemies. Wherfore incountering with the Northerne enemie, the Saxons had the better, whereof they sending word home into their Countrey, as also of the fruitfulnesse of the land, the Saxons sent ouer a great nauy and number of men better appointed for the warres, which being nowe ioined with the former band, drewe to a stronger army then all the power of the Brytaines was able to ouercome. Those by the Brytains were allowed a place to dwell among them, with that condition, that they should warre for them against their enemies, for wages of the Brytaines. W. Malmes.

These Saxons, English, and Iuites that came from beyonde the Seas, were three of the strongest Nations in Germanie. Of the Iuites came the people of Kent, and the Ile of Wight, and also they in the prouince of West Saxons are called Iuites right ouer against the Ile of Wight. Of the Saxons (that is, of the Region now called olde Saxons) descended the East Saxons, the South Saxons, and the West Saxons. Of the English descended the East English, the Percies, and the Northumbers. The chiefe Captaines of the Saxons are saide to be two brethren, Hengist and Horsius. This Hengist (saieth Geffrey Monmouth) on a time required of King Vortiger, so much ground as mought be compassed with a thong of a bulles skinne, thereupon to build a place to rest in, which the king granted, where Hengist built a

Castell,

Castell, which hee called Thong Castell, and therein feasted king Vortiger with great royalty, and when night was come that the king shoulde go to rest, Rowen the daughter of Hengist by commandement of her father, came with a cuppe of gold in her hand, and kneeling before the king, said to him, Wassaile, and he againe, by counsell of an interpreter, answered, Drinke haile: at which time king Vortiger seeing the beauty of this Rowen, hee was enamoured, and desired to haue her to wife, which was graunted by her father on condition, the king should giue him al the country of Kent, for him and his people to dwel in, which the king willingly, but vnaduisedly graunted, and espoused the Damosell. Thong Castell in Kent.

Thong Castell in Kent, is now a small village, litle more then halfe a mile from Sibingborne. The ditches, and the keepe hill of Thong Castell appeare in a little wood a two slight shote by south from Thong Church. Thong is a mile from the mouth of Shelton creeke, and about halfe a mile from Shelton towne, if passage were through the Marishes the nert way.

For the loue that Vortiger bare to Rowen the Saxon, he was diuorced from his lawfull wife, by whom he had three sonnes, for which deede, weinere all the Brytaines forsoke him.

Vodine Archbishop of London, a man of singular deuotion and good life, by the aduise of Vortimer, went to Vortiger, and saide to him, that hee had not done as a christian Prince, in departing from his lawfull wife, and taking another woman, whose father was an enemie to the christian faith, and also went about to conquer the Crowne of Brytaine. Then saide Vortiger, I was not wise when I brought the Saxons to help me against mine enemies, but I was more vnwise, when I was taken with the inordinate lust of the daughter of Hengist, I knowne that mine Empire will be terrible, except I repent me with speede and turne to God. Archbishop of London reproueth the king.

Hengist hearing Vortiger make this lamentation, blamed him, for that hee beleeued the perswasions of a prophane man, of fained life (as he termed him) and forthwith slewe the good Archbishop Vodine, and many other priestes, and religious persons. All the Churches in Kent were polluted with blood, the Nuns, with other religious persons, were by force put from their houses and gods, and constrained to pollution of their bodies. The Brytaines considering the dailie repaire of the Saxons into this Realme, shewed to their king the ieoperdy that might thereof ensue, and aduertised him of the danger, but all was in vaine: for Vortiger, by reason of his wife, bare such fauour to the Saxons, that he would in no wise heare the counsell of his subiects, wherefore, they with one minde deprined him of his royall dignitie, when he had raigned fiue yeeres, and ordained to be their king Vortimer his eldest sonne.

VOrtimer pursued the Saxons, and by his martiall knighthode fought against them foure battelles, besides diuers skirmishes, vntill at length he was poisoned by the means of Rowen his stepmother, after he had raigned fiue yeeres. The first battell Hengist and Horse, who were (saieth Bede the sonnes of Wiglise, whose father was Vecta, whose father was Woden, fought 454

Bede ſaith that Horſe was buried in eaſt Kent, where his tombe or monument, bearing his name was in his time to be ſeene.

Horſted in Kent.

And true it is, that in Kent is a place, to this daie called Horſtede, about two miles from Aelſford, in the pariſh of Chetham, where the people of that countrie ſay the ſaid Horſe was ſlaine. There was alſo ſlaine in the ſame battaile at Aegleſthorpe Catigerne brother to Vortimer, whoſe monument remaineth till this day, on a great plain heath in the pariſh of Aelſford, & is now corruptly called Cits cotthons, for Catigernes. (I haue my ſelfe in compaſſe of diuers woorthipfull and learned Gentlemen beheld it in Anno 1590.) and is of foure flat ſtones, one of them ſtanding vpright in the middle of two other, incloſing the edge ſides of the firſt, and the fourth laid flat aloft the other three: and is of ſuch height, that men may ſtand on either ſide the middle ſtone in time of ſtormie or tempeſt, ſafe from wind and rain, being defended with the breadth of the ſtones, as hauing one at their backes, one on eyther ſide, and the fourth ouer their heades. And about one coites caſt from this monument lieth an other great ſtone, much part thereof in the ground, as fallen downe where the ſame hath beene fixed.

The ſecond battaile Hengiſt and Eske fought with the Brytaines in a place called Crecanford, or Craford in Kent, of the Brytaines many periſhed by the ſworde, the reſt of them abandoned Kent altogether, and with great feare fled to London.

Wepped ſleete

The thirde battaile, Hengiſt and Eske fought with the Brytaines in a place called Wepped ſléte, that is to ſaie, the ſléete of Wepped, where they killed Dukes or Captaines of the Brytaines, with manie other, whereas on the partie of the Saxons there was one onelie man ſlaine, whoſe name was Wepped.

The fourth battaile was fought by Hengiſt and Eske againſt the Brytaines, neere to a Poole called Colmoore, the which was ſore fought by the Saxons, and long continued with great danger to the Brytaines, becauſe that the ſaid Poole incloſed a part of their hoſte ſo ſtronglie, that the Brytaines could not approch to them, beeing beaten off with the enimies ſhotte, albeit in the ende, the Saxons were put to flight, and manie of them drowned in the ſame Poole.

VOrtiger obtained againe the kingdome, & ſhortlie after Hengiſt, which was chaſed into the Ile of Thanet, entred the land with a number of Saxons, but when he heard of the great aſſembly the Britains had made againſt him, he treated for peace, which in fine was concluded. Shortlie after Hengiſt (by a guile which before he had deuiſed) bid his ſonne in law, and three hundred of his Nobles vnto a feaſt or banquet, where when he had ouerlaide his gueſtes with ouermuch wine, hee fell to quarelling, and with tauntiug talke, pinched euerie one of them, and ſtraight fell to fighting, where through the Brytaines were ſlaine euerie one. The king was taken priſoner, and forced to giue for his ranſome, Kent, Suſſex, Suffolke, and Northfolke. This murther of the Brytaines taines was on the plaine of Salisbury. Then Hengist ordayned his traine on ouer Kent, & Vortiger fled into Wales, and builded there a Castell, of which building, and long let of the same, one of his Prophet Merlin, Geffrey Monm. and others speake many things. Great companies of the Saxons daily flocked into this Iland, and grew so strong, that the people of the countrey which sent for them, stode in great feare of their puissance, for whole Saxons had taken league with the Picts, & began to turne their force vpō the Brytains: and to be short, the fire once kindled in the lands of the Pagans there, toke full reuenge of the wickednes of the people, raging first vpō the cities and country nerbay ioyning, after from the east sea to the west, ouerwhelming all the whole Iland without resistance: both publike and priuate houses were ouerthowne to the ground: the Priests were slaine standing at the altar: the Bishops with their flock were murthered, without respect of their dignity, nor there was any that would bury the slaine: some of the miserable leauings being taken in the hils, were there killed: other being sterued with hunger, were faine to creepe out of their caues, & buy their victual at their enemies hands with sale of their libertie for euer, if yet they were not killed out of hād: other fled ouer the seas with an heauy hart: other tarrying still in their country in feare of death, and lacke of food, liued full miserably in the mountaines, woods, and cliffes. Aurelius Ambrose, and Vther (brethren of Constantine that was before slaine in France) landed with a naule of ships at Totnes, made warre vpon Vortiger, and burned him in his castell in Wales, when he had secondly raigned fiue yeeres.

AVrelius Ambrose was ordained king of Brytaine, in whose time the Brytaines by little and little began to take strength and courage vnto them, comming out of their caues in which they lurked before, and with one consent, calling for heauenly helpe, that they might not for euer be vtterly destroyed, they hauing for their captaine and leader, the foresaid Ambrosius Aurelius, assembled themselues togither, and prouoking the Saxons to fight, through Gods assistance atchieued the victorie, and from that day forward, were the men of the country. Now the enemie had the victorie, vntil the yeere that Bathe was besieged, where they gaue their enemies a great ouerthrow, which was about the foure and fortieth yeere of their comming into the land. But of this wee shall speake more hereafter.

466 Bede. W. Malmes.

Of this Ambrosius, William Malmesburie writeth thus: Aurelie, euen then (saieth he) the Brytaines had gone to wracke, if Ambrosius, who onelie and alone of all the Romanes, remained in Brytaine, and was Monarch of the Realme, after Vortiger, had not kepte vnder the proude Barbarians, with the notable trauaile of the warriour Arthur. Now it followeth in Geffrey, that this Ambrosius caused Churches to bee repaired, which had beene spoyled by the Saxons: hee caused also the great stones to bee set on the plaine of Salisburie, which is called Stonehenge, in remembrance of the Brytaines that were slaine and buried there, in the raigne of Vortiger, at the banquet, and communication of Hengist with the Saxons. This ancient monument is yet to be seene, and is a number of stones, rough and of a gray colour, 21. foote in length, and about 10 foote in breadth, they are ioyned

It appeareth, that there hath beene three ranks going round as circles one within another: whereof the vttermost and largest, containeth in compasse about 300. foote, but the other rankes are decaied, and therefore hard to reckon how many stones there be.

The Chronicles of the Brytains do testifie, that whereas the Saxons, about the yeere of our Lord 450. had slaine 480. of the Brytaines nobilitie by treason, and vnder colour of a treaty, Aurelius Ambrose now king of the Brytains, desirous to continue their memorie, with some worthy monument, caused these stones to be set vp in place of their murther and buriall, the which stones hadde beene first brought from Affrike into Ireland, and placed on Mounte Kyllare, and from thence by the industrious meanes of Merlin, were conueyed to this place to the foresaide end. There are about this place, certaine little hilles, or banks, vnder the which are found sometimes bones of bigge men, and peeces of armor, also not far from thence remaine old ruines of the maner of a fortresse, which the Romans (as it is not vnlike) did build there in times past.

The Towne of Ciliceſter is yet to be ſéene in Hamſhire, euen in the verie edge of it, as the booke deuideth, it is 6. miles or more from Reading, and contayneth within the wall of ſtone about 80. acres of ground, deuided into three fieldes, beſide the ground about the manner place it ſelfe, and the Church. The wall is about 2. miles compaſſe, with foure places where gates haue béne, on the which wall grow ſome Oakes of 10. cart loade the péece, the ground within the wall is almoſt leuell with the toppe of the ſame wall, but without, the wall is 6. or 7. foote of height, aboue the ground within the wall at this preſent is one farme houſe, and a parith Church, the parithioners thereof dwell without the Towne, there is in digging and plowing much Romane money found, the ground there beareth good corne, ſaue in ſome place, the corne being marueilous faire to the eye, and ready to ſhew perfecter, it deceiteth. The lands of the towne, after the conqueſt came to one Blewith, & then one of the Blewiths leauing no heyre male, the land not entailed to the heyres generall, came by marriage to one Peter de Cuſance Knight: and after to one Edward Baynard, comming out of the houſe of the Baynards of Eſſer, whoſe name is now obſcured there, thus much of Ciliceſter. And now againe to Arthur, who, as is reported, toke to wife Guineuer, couſin to Cador Duke of Cornwal, and daughter to the king of Biſkay. Of this king Arthur there be many fabulous reportes, but certaine he was (ſaith W. of Malmesbury) a Prince more worthy to haue aduancement by true hiſtories, then falſe fables, being the only prop and vpholder of this his countrey.

There is yet to be séene in Denbigh shire, in the parish of Lanfanan, in the side of a stonie hil, a place compasse, wherin be foure and twenty seats for men to sit in, some lesse, and some bigger, cut out of the maine Rock by mans hand, where

While Arthur was valiantlie occupied in his wars beyond the Seas, (where he wrought many wonders, as some haue written, but far vnlike to be true,) Mordred, to whome he had committed the gouernement of Brytaine, confederating himselfe with Cerdicus first king of the West Saxons, traiterously vsurped the kingdome, of which treason, when relation came to Arthur, hee speedilie returned into Brytain, and at Richborow neere to Sandwich, gaue battel to him, and wanne the fielde. More then 600. yeares after his death, to wit, about the yeare of Christ 1189. which was the last yeare of the raigne of king Henry the second, his bodie was founde, buried in the Churchyarde, betwixt two pillars, vbi. foote deepe vnder ground, but those that digged the ground there to find his body, after they had entred about 7. foote deepe into the earth, they found a mightie broade stone, with a leaden Crosse fastened to that part which late downewardes towardes the corpes, containing this inscription.

Hic iacet sepultus rex Arturius in insula Aualonia.

This inscription was grauen on that side of the Crosse which was nert to the stone, so that til the Crosse was taken from the stone, it was not seene. His body was found, not inclosed within a tombe of stone, but within a great tree made hollowe like a trough, the which being digged vp and opened, therein was found the bones of Arthur, which were of a maruellous bignesse, as Giraldus Cambrensis, a learned man that then liued, reporteth to haue heard of the Abbot of Glastenburie, of whome he was enformed that the thigh bone of Arthur being set vp by the leg of a very tall man, came aboue his knee the breadth of three fingers. The skull of his head of a wonderfull bignesse, in the which head there appeared the prints of x. wounds or mo: all the which were growne into one seame, except onely that whereof hee died, which being greater then the other appeared verie plaine. Also in opening the tombe of his wife Guineuer, that was buried with him, they found the tresles of her haire whole and perfect, finely platted, of colour like to gold, but being touched fell to dust: the Abbot of that house (sometime Prior of Bermondsey) was named Henry Bloys, and was nephew to king Henry the second, by whose commandement the buriall of Arthur was searched for and found. Whose bones, with the bones of Guineuer his wife being found, were remoued into the newe great Church, (for the old was burned in Anno, 1171.) and there buried in a faire Tombe of Marble, laying the bones of the king at the head of the Tombe, and the bones of the Quéene at his féete toward the West. The kingdome of the East Saxons began vnder Erchenuious, about the yeere of Christ, 614.

The kingdome of Mercia, or middle England, began vnder Penda, 626.

CAdwalin, the sonne of Cadwane, raigned ouer the Brytaines, he warred strongly vpon the Saxons, and made Penda king of Mercia tributarie to him: He raigned xlviii. yeeres, and was buried at London, in a Church of S. Cadwalladar (saith Geffrey) was ordained king of the Brytaines, and ruled only iii. yeres: he vanquished and slew Lothier king of Kent, & Athelwold king of south Saxons: and then forsaking his kingly authoritie, hee went to Rome, there to be christened, who after became a Ponke, and was buried in S. Peters Church at Rome. He was last king of Brytaine, (saith Geffrey) but Bede sheweth, that Lothier king of Kent was slaine by Edrike, who succeeded him in that kingdome of Kent, and Ethelwold he saith was slaine by a Saxon called Ceadwalla K. of the West Saxons, which Ceadwalla went to Rome, and was there buried as ye may read in the history of the West Saxon kings.

NOw are we come to the time wherein God (who for the sinnes of the people translateth kingdomes) dispossessed the Brytains of their ancient habitation, and rule of this land, who by the victorie of Saxons were enforced, either to miserable seruitude, or driuen into the Westerne partes of the Ile, now called Wales and Cornwall, (where they now inhabite,) or els to their countreymen the Brytains in France. They also called the Brytains Walshmen, as who should say strangers, that vse an vnknowen tongue. This happened in the raigne of Ceadwalla king of the West Saxons, whome Geffrey Monmouth calleth Cadwalladar king of the Brytains about the yeere of Christ, 685. when the Brytaines being wasted with ciuill dissention, pestilence and famine, lost all that small that they had long time painfully kept, and were couched in a corner. Thus much for the Brytaines, and now shall be shewed the raigne of the Saxons, who enioying the fertile soile of this Realme, parted it in processe of time into seauen kingdomes: Kent, Southsex, East-angles, East-saxons, Mercia, Nothumberland, and West-saxons, which the learned call the Heptarchie of the Saxons, of which kingdomes, I purpose (for auoyding of confusion) to treat seuerally, setting downe the limits of these Countries, with the succession, actes, and ciuill battailes of their pettie kings, vntill the time that this Heptarchie, or gouernment of seauen, was reduced to a Monarchie, or regiment of one.

456 KEnt the first kingdome, possessed by the Saxons, containing that country that stretcheth from the East Ocean to the riuer of Thamis, hauing on the Southwest side Southrey, on the West London, and vpon the Northeast the said riuer of Thamis. It hath the Archbishoprieke of Canterbury Metropolitane and primate of all England, and the Bishoprieke of Rochester, and had kings as followeth.

HEngist the sonne of Widgils, the sonne of Victa, the sonne of Wecta, the first sonne of Woden & Frea, was the first of the Saxons that made himselfe king of Kent, as before ye haue heard, eight yéeres after his first entring into this Iland, in the yére from Christs byrth 456. He raigned xxviii. yéeres, and died honorably saith Marianus, others haue written, that by the counsell of Elded B. of Glocester, Edell Duke of Glocester caused his head to be cut off, at Conesborow. But this hath no likelihood of truth, for certaine it is, that Robert base sonne to Henry the first, was made the first Earle of Glocester, and Henry the eight made the first Bishop of Glocester.

514 Otta sonne of Eske raigned xvii. yéeres.

536 Ermericus the sonne of Otta raigned xv. yeeres.

562 W. Malmes. EThelbert the sonne of Ermericus had the gouernment of this kingdome, by the space of liii. (or after Beade, lvi.) yeeres. This Ethelbert in the beginning of his raigne being but a childe, was troubled with warres on euery side, that he could hardly defend his owne coasts. In his first battaile against Ceauline king of the West Saxons & Cuthe his sonne, he was forced to make his flight into Kent, hauing two of his Dukes Oslaue and Cnebbano slaine in a place called Wibadunt: but when he came to more age, and was more cunning in warre, in short space he ouercame all the kingdomes of the Saxons round about him, saue the Northumbers. And to the ende hee would haue acquaintance with forraine princes, he made affinity and alliance with the king of Fraunce by the marrying of his daughter Berta, a Christian woman, to whom he permitted to vse the lawes and rites of her Countrey, and to haue a Bishop, whose name was Letardus, to remaine with her, for her better instruction in the lawes of God. By this meanes the barbarous and Heathen Saxons kéeping company with the French, did agrée to haue all one lawe and like customes: besides this, the chast and vertuous life of Letardus the Bishoppe, and the other French, which came with the Quéene; changed the kings minde vnto the knowledge of Christ, whereby it came to passe, that afterward hee did giue some place to the preaching of Augustine. At this time (saieth Beade) the Brytaines being at quiet, little regarding the stormes past in their fathers daies, and hauing respect onely to the present prosperous estate in the which they then liued, were so set to breake all good orders of truth and iustice, that that scant any token or remembrãce therof remained, but only in a few, amõg manie other of their doings, which their owne Historiographer Gildas, doth lamentably set forth in writing (he saith of them thus) that they never toke care to preach the Gospell of Christ vnto the Angles and Saxons, which inhabited the land among them. But yet the goodnes of God prouided for the said nation of the Angles, much more worthy preachers, by whome they might be brought to the faith. Gildas.

In the yere 596. Pope Gregorie moued of godlie instinction in the hundred forty and seuen yere after the arriuall of the Angles in Brytaine, sent Augustine, Melitus, Iustus and Iohn, with sundrie other Monkes that liued in the feare of GOD, to preach the Gospell, to the nation of the Angles in Brytaine, which landed in the Ile of Thanet, and were first receiued by Ethelbert king of Kent, whom they conuerted to the Christian faith with diuers of his people in the 34. yere of his raigne: and king Ethelbert delaying no time, gaue vnto Augustine the Citie of Canterburie, who furthered thus by the king, receyued at his handes an olde Church, sometime founded there by the faithfull Romanes, and dedicated the same to our Sauiour Iesus Christ, which since was called Austins Marianus; Floriacen. Bede. Austine came into Brytaine. Ethelbert was the first Christian king of the Saxons. S. Augustines at Canterbury builded.

Augustine consecrated Melitus and Iustus Bysshoppes, and appointed Melitus to preach vnto the East Saxons, who with their king Sebert the nephewe of king Ethelbert, at the preaching of Melitus receiued the word of life.

King Ethelbert founded the Church of Saint Paul in London. Iustus was made Bysshop of Rochester, where Ethelbert builded for him and his successors the Church of S. Andrew. S. Paules in London founded. S. Andrewes in Rochester founded. Bede.

This yere 603. died Pope Gregory the first, vpon the fift of March, being the seconde yere of Phocas the Emperour, after hee had gouerned the Romane See 13. yeres, 6. monethes, and 10. daies, after whome succeeded Sabinian the first.

About this time (saith Bede) Austine (by the aide of king of Ethelbert) called together the Bysshoppes and Doctors of the greatest prouince and nerest to him, which were the Brytaines, to commune with them, in a place which to this daie is called Augustines Oake, as yee woulde saie the power and strength of Austin, beeing in the borders of the Viccians and West Saxons. There hee beganne with brotherlie admonition (saieth Bede) to perswade them to peace, and Catholike vnitie with him, and to communicate with him for Gods sake the labour of preaching the Gospell to the Heathen of England: for as yet they kept not the Easter Sundaie in due time, but from the fourteenth to the twentieth Mone, which compt is conclvded in compasse of eightie foure yeres, they vsed moreouer, manie other things contrarie to the vnitie of the Church, which when they had bene with long discourse declared, and these men, neyther for prayers, rebukes, or threates of Augustine and his companie woulde giue their assent, but rather preferred their owne traditions before all other Churches which throughout the worlde, agreed with Austine in Christ. Whereupon Austine fell to prayer, and also restored a blinde man to sight (sayeth Bede) which the Brytaines Austine exhorted the Brytaines to a vnitie with him.

coulde not doe, and therefore confessed indeede that to bee the true waie of righteousnesse which Austine had preached and shewed them, but yet they saide they coulde not alter their olde customes without the consent of their Clergie and people. They desired therefore to haue a seconde Synode of a greater multitude. Which when it was appoynted to bee so, there came by report seuen Brytaine Bishoppes, and many other well learned men, especiallie out of their greatest Monasterie of Bangor, where at that time Dinoth was Abbot.

Second Synode

Monastery of Bangor.

These men being nowe readie to goe to the foresayde Synode, came first to a certayne holie and wise man (which liued there about an Anchorites life) to aske his counsell, whether they ought at Austines preaching and exhortation leaue their traditions or no, who answeared them: if (quoth he) hee bee a man of God, followe him. But howe shall wee proue (sayde they) that hee is a man of God? The Anchorite answeared, our Lorde saieth, take on you my yoke, and learne you of me, for I am milde, and humble of heart: it is likelie that himselfe beareth the yoke of Christ, and will offer you the same to beare; but if he be curst and proude, it is certaine, that he is not of God, neyther must we much esteeme his wordes.

Then they enquired of him howe they might knowe whether this Austine were proude or not, marie (quoth hee) proude yée that hee with his companie come first to the place of the Synode, or Councell house. And if when yée approch neere, he ariseth courteously to you, thinke ye that hee is the seruant of Christ, and so heare yée him obedientlie: but if hee despise you, nor will vouchsafe to rise at your presence, which are the more in number, let him likewise bee despised of you.

And truelie as this Anchorite bade them, so did they, for it happened that when they came thither, Austine was alreadie there, and sate in his chayre, which when they sawe, straightwaie waxing wroth, they noted him of pryde, and therfore endeuoured to ouerthwart and gainesay whatsoeuer he proposed, his Oration briefelie was thus: Although deare brethren in many other points yée doe contrarie to our custome, or rather contrarie to the custome of the vniuersall Church of Christ; yet notwithstanding, if yée will in these three things consent vnto me: that is, to celebrate the Easter in due time, to accomplish the ministerie of Baptisme, according to the Romane and Apostolike Church, and last of all to preach with vs to this English nation the worde of our Lorde, all your other Ceremonies, Rites, and Customes, though they bee contrary to ours, yet we will willinglie suffer, and bee contente to beare with them. But they answered, they would doe none of the thinges requested, neither would account him for their Bishoppe: saying naie, if hee would not so much as rise to vs, truelie the more we should now subiect our selues to him, the more would hee hereafter despise vs, and set vs at naught. To whom Austine threatfullie prophesied, that if they would not take peace, and bee at accord with their brethren, they should receyue and feele warre from their enemies. And if they would not preach to the Englishmen the waie of life, they should suffer at their hand, and by their power the vengeance of death, which king came to passe afterwarde, as shall bee shewed in the raigne of Edilfride king of the Northumbers.

The saide yeere of Christ 603. also died Augustine the Archbyshop, the xvi. day of May, after the deceasse of Saint Gregory, two monethes, two weekes, & two dates. And after himselfe had beene consecrated Archbyshoppe of Canterburie, eyght yeeres, fyre monethes, and xi. dates, but before hee deceassed, he ordained Laurence to succeede him in the Archbyshoppricke, which hee (while in his life time the rather perfourmed, least that after he was deade, the state of the Church (being as yet but rude and late elie converted) might begin to wauer and fall, if it shoulde haue lacked a pastour) ruled neuer so little a while: his bodie was for a time layde in the porche of the foresaide Church of Saint Peter and Paul, bycause the Church was not yet finished nor dedicated, but shortlie after the dedication of the same, (which was done by Laurence his successor) hee was translated into the Church, and layde on the North side thereof decentlie. And vpon his Tombe was written this Epitaph. Hic requiescit Dominus Augustinus Dorobornensis Episcopus primus, &c. Here resteth blessed Augustine, the first Archbyshoppe of Dorobornia, who being sent hither of holie Gregory, Byshoppe of Rome, and strengthened of God by the working of miracles, conuerted king Ethelbert and his people from the worshipping of Idoles, to the faith of Christ, and fulfilling in peace the dayes of his office, he died the 26. day of May, in the raigne of the same king Ethelbert. Augustine the Archbyshop deceaseth. Gocelini monachi Cantuariani. Epitaph of Augustine.

The noble king Ethelbert, making prouision for them that should come after, brought the lawes of his countrey into the mother tongue, thereby to reward the good accordingly, and to wishfull and the wicked by seuere meanes, and left nothing whereof his posteritie needed to doubt in any matter, and then after his temporall raigne, which he had kept most gloriouslie ouer the Kentish Saxons, the space of 54. (or after Bede 56.) yeeres, he entred into the eternall blisse of the kingdome of heauen vpon the foure and twentieth day of February being the eleuenth yeere after that he had receiued the faith of Christ, and the nineteenth yeere after S. Augustine with his company were sent to the English nation to preach: he was the third king, and raigned ouer all the South prouinces, which are separated from the North by the Riuer of Humber, and the borders adioyning thereunto. King Ethelbert being married to the Ladie Bertha a Christian woman, and daughter of the king of France, receiued of her a sonne named Edbald, (who married Emma the daughter of the king of France) and a daughter named Ethelburge otherwise called Tate, that was married to Edwin king of Northumberland, which Edwin was conuerted to the faith by Byshop Pauline. The place of king Ethelberts buriall was in Saint Martines parish within the church of the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul neere Canterburie, on the North side of the same church, which he builded from the ground as before is declared, where also the noble Ladie Queene Bertha his wife was buried before him, and the byshop Lutardus that came out of France with her, and vpon his graue was left this inscription. EDbald when he had taken vpon him to rule the Realme, and stode in feare of his father, he did not only refuse to accept the faith of Christ, but was also polluted with such a fornication as the Apostle witnesseth neuer had been heard of among the Gentiles, which is, that he had maried his fathers wife, with the which two haynous facts he gaue occasion to his subiects to returne to their former filth, which vnder his fathers raigne for feare or for feare of the king had yelded to the lawes of christian faith, & chastity: but the scourge of God, and vengeance from heauen wanted not to the punishment of this vnfaithfull king, for he was plagued with often frensie of minde, and raging furie of an vncleane spirit, but by Laurence Archbishop of Canterbury, he was at length conuerted from his Idolatry, and vnto vtter sinne, and was turned againe to the faith, and being baptized, he endeuoured to maintaine the state of the Church in all points to the vttermost, he builded a Chappell within the Monastery of S. Peter and Paul, and gaue to that Monastery a great portion of land, he is said to be the first founder of Fulkstone in Kent, but I haue seene no Charter thereof, he raigned 25. yeares, and was buried by his father in the Monastery of S. Peter and Paul.

640 ERcombert the sonne of Edbald by Emma his wife, bee first suppressed the Temples of the Idoles, and because his people were giuen to excesse, commanded a solemne fast of fortie daies long, to bee obserued throughout all his kingdome, and raigned twentie fiue yeares. It is recorded in the antiquities of Christes Church in Canterburie, that about this time Honorius Archbyshop of Canterburie diuided his prouince into Parishes. Which Honorius deceassed in Anno 653. when hee had sate Archbyshoppe twentie yeares.

The prouince of the Archbishoppricke of Canterbury diuided into Parishes.

667 EGbert his sonne succeeded, whose quiet gouernment for a long season was afterward defaced by the cruell murder of Ealbert, and Egelbright his cousins Germans, whom either he slew himselfe, or procured to be slaine by a traitor named Thunor: he raigned nine yeares.

The Ladie Dompneua next true heire to the Crowne from Edbald, erected a Monasterie called Minster in the Ile of Thanet, and became first Abbesse there.

674 LOtharius succeeded his brother Egbert, who being assaulted oftentimes by Edrike the sonne of Egbert, in a cruell fight was shot through with a dart, whereof he died vnder his Surgeons handes, when hee had raigned thirteene yeares, and was buried with his predecessors kings, in the Monastery of Peter and Paul by Canterburie.

The Kentishmen, by casting of fire, did cruelly burne Mol the brother of Cedwall King of the West Saxons, and twelue of his knightes with him: wherewith Cedwall being moued to furie, did miserably harrie and spoile all Kent, so that by the space of fiue yeare, there was no king in that Country.

Withredus

WIlfredus the sonne of Egbert purchasing peace with money, was then established king, in which state he behaued himselfe very honourably, both in peace and warre. He founded the Priorie of Saint Martin at Wimer, and raigned xxviii. yéeres, with whom king Swebhearde raigned iointly in one part of his kingdome. 698

EDbert the sonne of Wichred walked in his fathers ordinances, and had like successe, and raigned three and twentie yéeres. 731

The yéere 729. two dreadfull Starres appeared, the one before the Sunne rising, the other after the Sunne setting, both which appeared in the moneth of Januarie, the space of 15. daies, and carried with them the likenesse of a bundle of fire against the North, and somewhat towardes the West, at which time the Pagans infested France and Spaine.

EDelbert his brother succéeded, in whose time the Citie of Canterburie (as is to be thought) was burned by chance: he raigned not vi. yéeres, and was buried in the Monasterie of Peter and Paul at Canterburie. 754

ALricke the thirde sonne of Wichred ruled Kent after his brethren, and was vanquished in a fought fielde against Offa king of the Mercians: he raigned foure and thirty yéeres, and was the last of the line or succession of the kings of Kent. 765

EDelbert or Egbert otherwise called Pren, then vsurped the kingdome, and leuied warre against the Mercians, by whome he was taken prisoner, and not long after released, but the Kentishmen would not receiue him, Cuthred then vsurped, and bare a title of a Kentish king for the space of eight yéeres. 799

BAlbred the heyre of Cuthred then toke on him the Princely dignitie, but Egbert king of the West Saxons so discomfited him in battell, that he fled ouer the Riuer of Thamis, and forsoke his kingdome, when he had raigned xv. yéeres, and was neuer heard of afterward, whereby this kingdome of Kent was united to the kingdome of the West Saxons. 807

The yéere 829. Wilfred Archbishop of Canterbury deceased, and was buried in Christs Church in Canterbury, when he had sate 27. yéeres, after whom succéeded Fleogild.

South Saxons.

SOuthsex the second kingdome, contained the Counties of Southsex and Surrey, which had on the East side Kent, on the South side the Sea, on the West side Hampshire, and on the North the riuer of Thamis: it containeth the Dioceses of Chichester, and part of Winchester.

AEle the eight from Woden, with his three sons Cimen, Plencing, and Cissa, came into Brytaine with 3. ships, & landed in a place called Kimenshore, and there slew many of the Brytains, & forced the rest to make their flight into a wood which is called Andredsleage. Afterward fighting with the Brytaines in a place néere vnto Pacrodes burne, slewe many of them, and put the rest to 478 slight. Then he and Cissa his sonne after long siege, brake into the City of Andreds Cester, and slew the inhabitants from the greatest to the smallest, and so began the kingdome of Southsex: he raigned xxvi. yeres.

514 Cissa his sonne succeded, he built the citie of Cissacester now called Chichester, & named it after his owne name, he raigned, as it is said, lxvi. yeres.

590 Ethelwulfus (whome Bede nameth Edelwach) was christened in the prouince of the Mercies, in the presence and at the exhortation of K. Wulfhere, who also at the font was his godfather, and in signe of that adoption, gaue him two prouinces, that is to say, the Ile of Wight, and the prouince of Manures, in the West part of England.

Bede. First christened King in Southsex.

Wilfride the Bishoppe came to the prouince of the South Saxons, vnto them did he minister the worde of Faith, by the permission and great reioicing of the king. This Bishop christened the chiefe Lordes and Knightes of the Countrie: and the rest of the people at the same time, or soone after were christened by other Priestes. The Quéne Ebba was christened in her Ile which was in the prouince of the Viccians: for shee was the daughter of Eanfride, who was Eanheres brother, where were both Christian men, and all their people. But all the prouince of South Saxons had neuer before that time heard of the name of GOD, nor the faith. Yet there was in that countrie a certaine Monke, a Scot borne, named Dicub, which had a very little Monastery in a place called Bosanham, all compassed about with woods and the sea, and therein v. or vi. brethren seruing GOD in humble and poore life, but none of the people there did giue themselues either to followe their life, or heare their preaching: but when Bishoppe Wilfride came and preached the Gospell vnto them, he deliuered the people not onlie from the perill of damnation, but also from an horrible murrain of temporall death. For in 3. yeres before, it had not rained in all those quarters, wherby a famine destroied the people by heapes, in so much that diuers times 40. or 50. in a company being famished for hunger, would go together to some rocke or sea banke, and cast themselues all downe, either to be killed with the fall, or drowned in the sea: but on the same day they receiued baptisme and faith, there fell a plentifull shoure of rayne, wherewith the earth flourished again. This Bishop also taught the people there to get their sustenance by fishing.

Edilwach gaue vnto Bishop Wilfride the land of 87. tenementes, where he might place his company, the name of the place was Seoleséy. In this place he founded a Monasterie, to be his Episcopall Sea.

605 Ceadwall a valiant young man of the West Saxons, being banished from his Countrey, came with an hoste of men and slewe King Edilwach, wasted that prouince, cruellie murdered and spoiled euerie where. Edilwach raigned xvi. yeres.

And soone after Ceadwall was driuen out by two Captaines of the Kinges, Bertham and Anthun, which from that time did holde and kéepe the Dominion of that prouince, the chiefe of which two, was afterwarde slaine of the same Ceadwall, (being then king of the West Saxons,) and the prouince subdued and brought into more grieuous subiection then it was before. Againe Ine that raigned after Ceadwall oppreſſed it with like miſery & bondage many yeres, whereby it came to paſſe, that the people of Suſſex in all this time could haue no Biſhop of their owne: but were faine (their firſt Biſhoppe Wilfride being called home to Yorke) to be vnder the Dioces of the Geniſes which belonged to the Weſt Saxons, as many as were in the territorie of Selſey.

After that Ceadwall had thus obtained the kingdome of the Weſt Saxons, hee toke the Ile of Wight alſo, which was ſo altogether giuen to the worſhipping of Idoles, that he intended vtterly to baniſh and driue out thence all the olde natiue inhabitants, and to put people of his owne Countrey in their place. For though he was not yet at that time baptized, and regenerate in Chriſt, yet he bound himſelfe with a vow, that if he toke the Iſland, he would giue vnto God the fourth part thereof, and of all the pray. Which thing he ſo performed, that Biſhoppe Wilfride happening to bee there at that time, a man of his owne countrey, he offered and gaue the ſame vnto him, to the vſe and ſeruice of our Lord. The ſaid Iſland contained as the Engliſh did rate it, 1200. tenements, whereof was giuen to the Biſhop, the poſſeſſion of the land of three hundred tenements, which portion the Biſhoppe gaue and committed to one of his Clearkes named Bernemi, and appointed ther to a Prieſt named Hildila, to miniſter the worde and baptiſme of life to all that would bee ſaued. Two children of the blood Royall, being brethren to Drualde King of that Iſland, being fledde into the next prouince of the Vites, where they had hidden themſelues in a place called Stoneſtat, were betraied and found out, whome the king commanded to be put to death. Which thing when a certaine Abbot named Cimberth had heard of, whoſe monaſterie was not far from thence, at a place called Redford, he came to the king, and deſired him that if hee would néds haue the children put to death, yet they mought firſt receiue the Sacraments of Chriſtes Church. The King granted his requeſt, and then hee toke and Catechiſed them in the faith of Chriſt and waſhed them with the font of Baptiſme, made them ſure in perfect hope to enter the kingdome euerlaſting, then were they put to death by the hangman, when after this order all the prouince of great Britaine had receiued the faith of Chriſt, the Ile of Wight receiued the ſame alſo: In which notwithſtanding, becauſe of the miſery and ſtate of forraine ſubiection, no man toke the degrée of the Miniſterie and place of a Biſhoppe, before Daniel, who was Biſhoppe of the Weſt Saxons, and of the Geniſes, Suſſex and Hampſhire.

The ſituation of this Ile is ouer againſt the mids of the South Saxons and Geniſes, the ſea comming betweene, of the breadth of three miles, which ſea is called Selent: in which, two armes of the Ocean Sea, that brake out from the maine North Sea about Britaine, doe daily méete and violentlie runne together beyond the mouth of the Riuer Homelen, which runneth along by the Countrey of the Vites that belong to the prouince of the Geniſes, and ſo entreth into the foreſaid Sea, and after this méeting and ſtriuing together of the two Seas, they goe backe and flowe againe into the Ocean from whence they came.

After his death Ceolla toke the Byshoprieke vpon him: after whose departure the Sea stode vacant many yeres.

East Angles.

EAst Angles the third kingdoome, contained the Countries of Norffolke and Suffolke, Cambridge, and the Isle of Ely, which had on the East and North sides the Sea, on the West, Saint Edmondes Dike, with a part of Hertfordshire, and on the South side Eller. It containeth the Dioceses of Norwich and Ely.

519 REdwaldus the tenth from Woden, as men write: this is hee that for the fauour of Edwine, killed Edelfride king of Northumberland. The same Redwalde was by the perswasion of Edwine baptized, but in vaine, for after by his wiues counsell he fell from the faith againe, his sonne Dorwaldus in pure and vncorrupted Christiantie was slaine by the heathen Rochbert. Redwaldus raigned xxv. yeres.

569 SEebert brother to king Carpewalde, toke vpon him the kingdome, a man in all pointes learned, and most Christian, who whilest his brother was yet liuing, being himselfe banished into France, was there baptized and instructed in the faith, of which faith he laboured to make all the Realme partakers, as soone as hee came to the Crowne. To whose good indeuour, Byshoppe Felix did greatly applie himselfe. Who when hee came from Burgundy (where hee was borne) into Bytantie to Honorius the Archbyshoppe, and had obtained licence of him to preath the worde of God vnto the foresaid East Angles, his zeale and vertuous desire prowed not in vaine, for he found in that nation plenteousnesse of fruite, and encrease of people that beleeued him. For he brought all this prouince vnto the faith, and workes of iustice, and in the ende to rewarde of perpetuall blessednesse, according to the abodement of his name, which in Latine is called Felix, and in our English tongue, Happie, he was made Byshop of Dunmocke, or Dunwich, an ancient Citie in Suffolke nowe sore decayed, and as is supposed more then halfe swallowed vp in the Sea.

came to decaie, there belonged thereunto two and fiftie deuine houses, as Parish Churches, Priories, Hospitalles, and Chappels, as manie Windmils, and as manie toppe Shippes. But certayne it is, as appeareth by manifest and sounde recorde which I haue seene, that euen of late time, there was within the sayde Towne fiue parish Churches, two houses of Friers, an house which had béene of Templars, two Hospitalles, and three Chappelles, foure of these parish Churches are now of late swallowed vp in the Sea, and but two of them remaining on the land, to wit, Saint Peters, and all Saintes. The men of Dunwich desiring succour for their Towne against the rage of the sea, affirme that a great peece of a Forrest, sometime thereby, is deuoured and turned to the vse of the Sea. Records Dun.

There hath béene a Mynt, manie men of that Towne can yet shewe of the coines, which are starling pence, with this inscription, Ciuitas Dunwic, twenty of which pence waighed an ounce, 12. ounces a pound Troy, and so being 11. s. in money, was both a pound in payment, & also a pound in waight, as is afore-said. This City was gouerned by a Maior and three Bailiffes besides inferiour officers, Felix their first Bishop sate 18. yéeres, and ended his life there in Anno 649. and was buried at Sehame, a place where sometime a great famous monastery stode replenished with religious persons, vnder their Abbat Warfred, which house was founded by a Noble man named Lutingus, and was wholie subuerted by the Danes: the bodie of Felix was remoued to Ramsete. Bishop Felix founded a Church at Radham, which was also amongst other destroyed by the Danes. Felix also founded Schooles at Felixstowe, nowe called Filchestow. After Felix succéeded Thomas, a Deacon, borne in Gerwy, hee sate fiue yeeres. After him Beretgilsus surnamed Bonifacius, a Kentish man borne, sate seuentene yéeres. After him succéeded Bisi, who diuided the Sea into two Bishoprickes, to wit, Dunwich, and Helmham. Thus much for Dunwich. Soham, now called Some foure miles from Ely. Radham. Felixstowe.

Sebert the king being desirous to followe the godlie order which he had seene in France, set vp Schooles in his kingdome (by the ayde of Felix, whome hee had taken out of Kent for that purpose) appointing masters and teachers to bring vp children in learning and vertue, after the manner of the Kentishmen. This Sebert was so inflamed with the loue of heauen, that leauing at the last all affaires of his Realme to the gouernement of his cousin Egrike, he became a Monke, and entred a monasterie by him builded, wherein hee bestowed his time in diuine studies, and contemplation: but the vplandish Englishmen with their old Captaine Penda, inuaded his dominions, so that his people after long resistance, finding themselues too weake, they pluckt Sebert out of the monasterie, and brought him against his will vnto the field, whereof the cruell heathen people he was killed, with king Egrike, and the whole armie discomfited, about the yeere of Christ 652.

ANna the sonne of Ewide brother to Edwald succéeded Egricus, and was likewise slaine by the furie of Penda, Captaine of Marches, or Uplandish Englishmen, then heathen and vnchristned people, when he had raigned nineteene yeeres, and was buried at Blidriburgh, in which place also 637 Blibrugh

Adelwaldus his brother succéeded him with like fortune, and left the king

East Angles: but when a Virgin named Alfride, daughter to Offa, whome Ethelbert should haue married, vnderstode thereof, shee willed his seruants to hacke them into their Countrey, for their Master was beheaded. And being taught by the Holy Ghost, prophecied to her mother in this manner, quoth she, Thy sonne shall not liue three yéeres, and the kingdome shall be vnstable, and thou thy selfe shalt not liue in the confession of God ouer three moneths, but shalt be possessed with a wicked spirite, and shalt eate thine owne tongue, and die an euill death: And it followed (saieth mine Author) as the Virgine had spoken: which Virgine vowed to liue a religious life, and became an An

When king Offa heard hereof, he repented him, and caused the bodie of E Kenchester. thelbert to bee remooued to Hereford three miles from Kenchester, and some

miles from Sutton Wallis, where afterward ouer him was builded a godly Church by king Milfride, which Church he endowed with great possessions, and made the same a Bysshops Sea: since which time the Church is dedicated to the said Ethelbert.

At Sutton Wallis there appeareth yet notable ruines of some ancient and great building, and therefore great likelyhood that it was sometime the mansion house of king Offa, at such time as Kenchester stode, or else Hereforde was a beginning. Paurdine village is about a mile from Sutton Wallis, and hard by is a hill whereas men saie Saint Ethelbert was beheaded. At this village is now a faire Church dedicated to Ethelbert. I thinke he was slaine at Sutton in king Offaes house, but ỳ name of Paurdine seemeth to expresse the martyrs hill.

Kenchester three miles from Hemeforth Westward, a mile from the banke of Wie riuer. There was a pallace of Offaes (as some say) the ruines yet remaine, there hath bene found ditches and flores. This towne is farre more ancient then Hereford, it standeth on the same side of the riuer Wie, and three miles or more aboue Hereford, and was in the Romans time, as appeareth by many things, especially by antike mony of the Cæsars very often found within the towne, & in plowing there about, the which, the people there calleth dwarfe money. The compasse of Kenchester hath bin by estimation as much as Hereford, excepting the Castell, the which at Hereford is very spacious: peces of the walles and towres yet appeare from the foundation: the people of Hereford haue fetcht much awaie from thence to build withall. The place where the towne was, is all ouergrowne with brambles, hasles, and like shrubs, there hath bẽ found in our time Brytaine bricks, conduites for water, stoned pauements, peces of golde, and other strange things. To be short, of the decay of Kenchester Hereford rose and flourished. Kenchester.

The towne of Hereford is large and strongly walled. Also having a maine Castell, hard by the ripe of Wie: the Castle is thought nigh as great of circuite as Windsore. The dungeon of the Castle is high, and strong, and in the dike not farre from it is a faire spring called Saint Ethelberts well. Within the Castle in digging hath bẽne found bones of men of great bignesse, and harde by in the ripe of the banke also is found the like bones: the wall of the town is compassed with a dike, alway filled with moysh water descending into it: this water resorteth to the bottome of Wie. There be in the town foure parish Churches, one being the Cathedrall Church of a very strong building, S. Ethelbert was buried there (but since the Welchmen destroyed the Towne in king Edward the Confessors time, his Reliques haue not bene seene there) there be in the suburbes two parish Churches, there hath bene a cell of blacke Monkes, and two houses of friars black and gray. Some say that this towne toke the name of an olde ford or passage ouer Wie, not farre from the castle: some say it was called Fernelege, or Fernehill: and the place where the cathedrall church now is, was a chapell of our Lady called Fernelege. Thus much for Hereford. Hereford.

After Ethelbert, few men of might raigned in east England, by means of the violence violence done by the Pictes, vntill Edmund borne in Saronie, in the Citie of Norhenberge sonne to king Alkemond and Quéene Syware. In which time raigned in East Angle a king named Offa, who minding a voyage to the holy land, toke his iourney through Saronie, there to visite his cousin Alkemond, and his nephew Edmond, which Edmond hee adopted to be his heire of East Angles. Nowe so it happened, that the saide Offa, hauing accomplished his voyage at the holy sepulture, and returning, decealled at Port Saint George, hauing before sent his ring to Edmond, making him gouernor of the East Angles, his father Alkemond prouided him of men famous by experience, both in armes and gentlenes; he had also clearkes circumspect & wise, to counsell him, he stuffed his ships with men and victuall: which thing done, and leaue taken of his father and mother, he sailed, and landed in East England, at a place called Haydenboure, where falling on his knées, he made deuoute prayer vnto God, that his comming thither might be to him acceptable, and to all the countrey profitable. And not farre from thence he builded a royall Towne, which to this day is called Hunstanstone, which betokeneth sweetnesse and great might: there he helde his householde nigh one yeare, and then remoued to Attlbrough, where he remained one whole yéare, and learned his Psalter in the Saron tongue, which booke was reserued in the Reuestrie of the Monasterie of Saint Edmundsbury, till the same Church was suppressed in the raigne of king Henry the eight, as I haue béene credibly informed.

870 EDmond raigned xv. yéares, in whose time Hinguar and Hubba, Danish kings, entring the prouince of the Northumbers, raged ouer all the same, and made great spoiles. Hinguar hauing gotten a great pray, left Hubba, and with his Nauy sailed into East Angle, and arriued at a certaine City thereof, vnawares to the Citizens, set it on fire, and slewe both man, woman and child. This wicked Hinguar toke Edmond king of that prouince, in a village then called Heglisdune, nére to a wood bearing the same name, where this holie Edmond being constant in the Christian faith, was first by the Pagans beaten with bats, then scourged with whips, he still calling on the name of Iesus: his aduersaries in a rage shot him full of shafts, and then smote off his head and threwe it into a bush: after which time the Angles ceased to raigne in the East Angle, but the same was possessed by Danes, till fiftie yéares after, that Edward the sonne of Etheldred did expulse the Danes, and ioyned that prouince, and also the East Saxons, to his kingdome of the West Saxons.

ESser the fourth kingdome contained Essex, Middlesex, and Hertfordshire, being bounded on the East, with the Germane Ocean, on the South with the riuer Thamis, on the West with Colne, and on the North with Stowre, which at this date parteth Suffolke from Essex: it containeth the diocesse of London.

Erchenwine,

ERchenwine, the eight from Woden, from whom all the Saxons derined their genealogies, first erected this Countrey to a kingdome, which neuer the lesse he held as feodarie to the kings of Kent, who were as yet the very soueraigns of the whole Countrey from Thames to Humber. And as we haue specified, Vortiger yelded seizon to Hengist for his deliuerie, when the Peeres of the Britaines were slaine on Salisbury plaine, and he taken prisoner. 527 Beade.

SLedda the sonne of Erchenwine succeeded his father in the gouernment, and to establish the state more sure, married Ricula the daughter of Ermenrich king of Kent, and enioyed his gouernment so quietly, that he ministred small matter to Historiographers. 587

SEbert the sonne of Sledda by Ricula, ruled this kingdome after his father. The second yeere of his raigne, which was the yeere of Christ 604. Augustine Archbishop of Canterbury, consecrated two Bishops, the one named Miletus, the other Iustus, Miletus hee appointed to preach to the people of the East Saxons, which are separate from Kent with the riuer of Thamis, & are next ioyned to the East sea, whose cheefe Citie is London, a princely port town, of many people, arriuing thither by sea and land. Nowe as sone as this province, by the preaching of Miletus: had receiued the word of truth. 603 Sebert first christian king of the East Saxons.

Ethelbert king of Kent builded in the Citie of London S. Paules Church, wherein Miletus and his successours were appointed euer after to haue their Sea. Iustus was ordained Bishop of Rochester in Kent, where king Ethelbert builded the Church of S. Andrew the Apostle, and gaue many goodly gifts to the Bishops of both churches. Which Ethelbert in his Charter to the Church of S. Paul, hath these words: Ædilbertus Rex, Deo inspirante, pro animæ suæ remedio dedit Episcopo Mileto terram quæ appellatur Tillingham ad monasterium siue solatium scilicet S. Pauli. Et ego Rex Athelbert ita firmiter concedo tibi præsuli Mileto potestatem eius habendi & possidendi, vt in perpetuum in monasterij vtilitate permaneat, &c. Saint Paules church in London founded.

Afterward king William the first, surnamed Conquerour, by his Charter, confirming the lands giuen by the saide Ethelbert king of Kent, to the saide Church of Saint Paul in London, hath these wordes: Wilhelmus Rex Anglorum omnibus fidelibus suis Francis & Anglis de Middlesex salutem. Sciatis, quod concedo Deo & sancto Paulo suisque seruitoribus 24. hidos quos Rex Ethelbertus dedit ecclesiæ sancti Pauli iuxta ciuitatem London, quando eam fundauit, in perpetuum liberas esse, & solutas & quietas de Dane-gildis & omnibus alijs gildis, & ab omni expeditione, & ab omni opere, & volo, & firmiter præcipio, vt bene & honorificè, & in pace teneant, & ne aliquis super hoc eis iniuriam vel contumeliam faciat. Teste Lanfranco archiepiscopo, &c. Moreouer, besides this confirmation aboue saide, the same king William gaue vnto the Church of Saint Paule in London, and vnto Mawrice then Bishoppe there of, the Castell of Stortford, or Stourforde in Esser, and all thinges which belonged thereunto, and namely, the land which William the Deacon, and Ralphe his brother held of the king. Thus much for the foundation of Saint Paules Church in London, founded by Ethelbert king of Kent, and confirmed by king William the Conquerour. Stourford in Essex.

King

King Sebert, by the perſwaſion of king Ethelbert his vncle, and through the preaching of Miletus, hauing embraced Chriſtianitie, was baptized by the ſame Miletus, and immediately, to ſhewe himſelfe a Chriſtian, built a church to the honour of Saint Peter, on the weſt ſide of London in a place, which becauſe it was ouergrowne with thornes, and enuironed with waters, the Saxons at that time called it Thorney, and now of the monaſterie, and weſt ſituation thereof, is called Weſtminſter. In this place long before was a temple of Apollo (as Sulcardus writeth) which being ouerthrowne with an earthquake, Lucius then built thereon a Church for the Chriſtians. Sebert (when he had raigned thirteene yeares) died, and was buried in the Church which he had built, with his wife Aethelgoda, whoſe bodies manie yeares after, as writte, in the time of Richard the ſecond (ſaieth Thomas Walſingham) were tranſlated from the olde Church to the newe at Weſtminſter, and there entered.

616 SErred, Seward and Sigbert, ſonnes of Sebert, ſolitly (as it ſeemeth) then ruled Eaſſex, men wickedlie giuen, irreligious, and deadly enemies to the Chriſtian profeſſion: who preſumed contemptuouſly to the Table of the Lord ſupper, being not baptized: and becauſe Miletus would not permit them to be partakers of the chriſtian ſacrament, they expelled him from his See at London, but ſhortly after Serred encountring with the Weſt Saxons, was ſlaine with both his brethren by king Kinegles.

SIgebert ſonne to Sigebalde, brother to Sebert, then ruled in Eaſſex, being by the perſwaſion of Oſwy king of Northumbers, abandoned all ſuperſtition, and became a chriſtian, and tooke an holie man Ced with him, who did mightily beate downe errours, and wanne many by preaching the chriſtian religion in his dominions, thereupon Ced was by Finan conſecrated Biſhop of the Eaſt Saxons, and then proceeded with more authoritie in his function, ordering prieſtes and Deacons in all places of Eſſex, but eſpecially at Ithancester and Tilberie.

In the good proceedings of Sigebert, he was ſlaine by a kinſman of his own, vpon none other occaſion, but for that he vſed to much clemencie towards his enemies, as the murtherers themſelues confeſſed.

Swidhelin ſon of Sexbald ſucceeded then in his regiment, who was baptized by Ced in a town of the kings called Kendletham in East England: Edelwald king of the Eaſt Angles, brother to Anna, was his godfather at the font.

SIgher then ruled with Sebba or Sebbi, although they were alſo vnder the allegeance of Wulfhere king of the middle Engliſhmen. This prouince being viſited with a great plague and mortalitie, Sigher with the people ouer whom he ruled, forſaking Chriſtes religion, fell to Apoſtaſie, for both the king himſelfe himselfe, and many of his people, as well of the Nobles as of the meaner sort, beganne to renue their temple, which had stood desolate, they worshipped their Idoles, as though they could by that meanes haue escaped the mortalitie. But Sebbi, his companion, with all vnder him, perseuered deuoutly in the faith, and he ended his life in great felicitie, as we shall hereafter declare. Wulfhere the king vnderstanding part of his dominions to fall from the faith, for to call them backe againe, sent vnto them Iarumanus the bishop of Lichfield, successor to Trumhere, who by much labour and diligence, being a man of great vertue, painefull and zealous (as a certaine Priest waiting then vpon him, and helping him in preaching the Gospell reported vnto Bede) brought them to the faith againe, both the king and all his people, so that abandoning, and throwing downe their Temples and Altars, they opened againe the churches, confessed gladly the name of Christ, and chose rather in hope of resurrection to die, then in the filth of idolatrie to liue. Which being so brought to passe, their priestes and instructers returned home with much ioy and comfort.

696 S^t Lambert murderd at Liege by Dodo brō. to Alpaïda for reproving Pepin for marrying her he was Bp of Tongren & Maestricht

Theodore Archbishop of Canterbury appointed Erkenwald to be bishop of the East Saxons in the citie of London. This Erkenwald, in the yere of Christ 677. before he was made bishop, had builded two godly monasteries, one for himselfe at Crotsey in the Ile of Crote in Surrey, by the riuer of Thames: and another for his sister Edilburge, in a place called Berching in Essex, for his sister Ethelburge she was first Abbas there. Sebbi king of the East Saxons (as is aforesaid) a man very deuout and godly, being giuen to often prayer, and charitable almes giuing, esteeming the solitary and monasticall life, before al the riches and honors of a kingdome, which kind of life he had long time before taken, & had giuen vp his kingdome, had not his wife refused to be separated from him. And therefore some men thought (as it had bene often said) that a man of such a nature and well disposed minde, was more meete to be made a bishop then a king. Now when this souldier of the Ecclesiasticall kingdome had passed a xxx. yeeres in his temporall raigne, at length he died: but first he admonished his wife, that then at the least they should wholy giue themselues both together to serue God, whereas they could no longer now enioy or serue the world together. Which thing, when he had with much ado obtained of her, he came to ỳ bishop of Londō, named Waldhere, who had succeeded Erkenwald, and at his hands receiued the habite of religion, which hee had long desired, to wit, of a Monke, for at that time were Monkes in the Church of S. Paule in London, as writeth Radulphus Dediceto and other.

To this Bishop he brought a great summe of money to be bestowed and giuen to the poore, reseruing nothing at all for himselfe, but rather desiring to remaine poore in spirite for the kingdome of Heauen. And when he perceiued the day of his death to be at hand, because his foresaide sickenesse grewe still vpon him, for the princely and hautie courage that he had, he beganne to feare least at his death, through bitter paine, he might hap, either to vtter with his mouth, or with his body do any thing that were not decent for his person, he sent for the bishop of London, where he also then continued, and desired him that at his departing out of this world, there should be no moe present but himselfe, selfe, and two of his Chaplaines: which thing when the Bishop had promised gladlie to do, the third day after he gaue vp the ghost, and was buried in a coffin of stone, and laid in the Church of the blessed Apostle Saint Paul, by whose good lessons hee had béene taught to labour, and long for the ioyes of Heauen.

King Sebbi buried in Paules church at London.

SIgeherd sonne of Sebbi, then raigned ouer the East Saxons for a time, and after him his brother Seofride.

SEofride sonne to Sebbi, and brother to Sigeherd, raigned next successiuelie, of whome I find nothing recorded of his acts.

Offa the sonne of Sigher then ruled this prouince, hee enlarged with building, and enriched with lands the Church of Westminster, and then forsaking his wife Geneswede Pendaes daughter, lands, kinne, and countrey, he went to Rome with Kenred king of Mercia, and Edwine Bishoppe of Worcester, and there in a Monkes coule ended this life, leauing Selred to rule his country.

Sigehrike and Sigehard afterward aspired to the kingdome of the East Saxon, but with no good successe, and so that kingdome ceased.

Mercians.

MErcia the fift kingdome and greatest of the other, contayned Glocester, Hereford, Chester, Stafford, Wircester, Oxford, Warwike, Darby, Leicester, Buckingham, Northampton, Nottingham, Lincolne, Bedforde, Huntington, and part of Hartford shires. It had on the West side, the riuer Dee fast by Chester, and Seuerne fast by Shrouesbery vnto Bristowe in the East, the East sea: in the South, Thamis vnto London: in the North the riuer Humber, and so Westward, downe to the riuer Perce, vnto the corner of Wyrhall.

This kingdome of Perce in the beginning was departed into three partes, into West Mercia, middle Mercia, and East Mercia: it containeth the diocesses of Lincolne, Wircester, Hereford, Couentry and Lichfield.

586 CReda (the eleuenth from Woden) first king of the Mercies raigned tenne yéeres.

595 Wibba his sonne raigned twenty yéeres.

616 Ceorlus his sonne raigned ten yéeres.

626 W. Malmes. PEnda the sonne of Wibba, a man actiue in wars, a frantike and most wicked man, toke on him the kingdome of the Mercies, when he was fifty yéeres olde: he shooke the Cities, and disturbed the borders of the kings, that were were his owne countreymen borne: hee slewe Edwine and Oswald, kinges of Northumberland, (where Oswald was slaine is nowe situate the Towne of Oswaldtree, which of him toke that name) he also slew Sigebert, Egfride, and Anna, kinges of the East Angles, which all were of holie life and conuersation: hee banished Kenwallus king of West Saxons, but in the ende, himselfe was slaine by Oswin which succeeded Oswald his brother, when hee had raygned thirtie yeares.

PEda the sonne of Penda, succeeded in part of the kingdome which was called middle England, who comming after to Oswine king of Northumberland, required his daughter Alfiede to wife, which sute he obtained, vpon condition he woulde receiue the christian faith, and be baptized: and so hee receiued Baptisme at the hands of Bychop Finan, in a famous Towne of the kinges called Ad murum, by the Picts wall, twelue miles from the East Sea, from whence he returned home with 4. priestes, notable for learning and vertue, which should instruct and baptize his people. These preached the worde of God, and were gladly heard, whereby manie daylie, as well noble, as of the base sorte, renounced their filthie idolatrie, and were baptized. Neither king Penda father to the yong Prince did withstand the preaching of the Gospell in his dominion, but persecuted such as bare the names of christians, and liued not accordingly, saying, that such men were wretched which regarded not to serue the God in whom they professed to beleeue. These things began thus two yeares before the death of Penda.

A notable saying of a heathē Prince.

In these daies king Oswine, after often and cruel inuasions of the heathen tyrant Penda, forced of necessitie offered manie and most precious iewels, with an infinite summe of treasure, to redeeme quiet and peace to his Countrie, but the barbarous tyrant, pursuing his deadly enterprise, and protesting vtterly to extinguish the whole nation from the highest to the lowest. King Oswine called to God for help against his enimies, vowing, that if he had the vpper hand, his yong daughter should be consecrated to God in perpetuall virginitie, and twelue farme places with the land, should bee conuerted to the erecting of monasteries. When preparing himselfe to battell, with a verie small armie, the army of the Heathen reported to be thirtie fold as manie, hee ouercame them: and this is to be noted as a great helpe to the Christians, that whereas the field was fought nigh to the riuer Iuruent, the saide riuer did at that time so ouerflowe the bankes and fieldes about, that in the flight of the heathen more were drowned then perished by the sword. And thus was king Pendaes power ouercome, and himselfe slaine, when he had raigned or raged cruellie thirty yeares. This Penda (saith Ingulphus) had sonnes that were most deuout maintainers of Christian religion, to wit, Peda, Vlfere, Ethelred, Marwald, and Mercelini, and daughters, Kinisburge and Kenesswith, both for holie conuersation excelling. The foresaid battell was fought by king Oswine, in the countrey of Leid, the thirteenth yeare of his raigne, the yeare of Christ 659. the fiftenth date of November. Oswyne hauing obtained this victorie, rendred due thanks therefore to God, gaue his daughter Elfiede to bee brought vp and consecrated to perpetuall virginitie, and also the twelue possessions promised hee performed.

The Lady Elfiede entred the monastery of Hartsey, to bee brought vp vnder Hilda the Abbesse, and afterward builded for her selfe a monasterie in a place called Strenshalt thirty miles from Yorke, and was there buried.

Strenshalt founded.

OSwine nowe raigning ouer the Mercies, and ouer the South people of England, subdued also the Pictes, for the most part, to his allegeance: he founded Lichfielde, and procured it to be a Cathedrall Church of that prouince: Dwina was first Byshop of Mercia, & also of Lindesferne, for there were then so fewe Priestes, that one Byshop was compelled to gouerne two Prouinces. This Dwina was a Scottish man, and gouerned the Church of Lichfield two yeere, and died at Fepping. The seconde Byshoppe was Cellach, a Scot, who ere long lefte his Byshoprieke, and went to Lindesferne. The thirde was Thrumhere an Englishman, who was also Abbot of Ingethling, a monastery builded where this king Oswine was slaine. The fourth was Iarman. The fift was Cedda, who was buried at Lichfield, though hee had founded an Abbey at Lindsey, in a place called Etheare. The first was Winfrothus. The seuenth Sexulfus a great builder of Peterborowe Abbey: after whose decease, two Byshops ruled the prouince or kingdome of Mercia, to wit, Winifrede at Chester, and Heda at Lichfield, after Winefled was reiected: and Hidda sate alone, and died in the yeere of Christ 721. &c. Nowe concerning the name of Lichfield. Iohn Rouse saieth there was in Brytaine a great number of Christians, which hearkened to the preaching of Amphibale (instructer of Albon) martyred and slayne in a place at Lichfielde, called Cadauerum campus, a place of dead bodies, &c. This towne, for the most part, standeth vpon a lowe and equall ground, onely the close and the cathedrall church, with a long strate, that lieth north on the bridge of the Towne, is somewhat vpon a high ground: there is no token that euer the Towne was walled: a ditch was made in a part of the Towne by Langton Byshop of Lichfielde. There hath béene a castell of auncient time, but no part of it standeth: the place of the ditch is séene, and is yet called Castel-fielde. In the maine Towne, which is a faire large thing, be three parish churches, S. Maries, a right beautifull peece of worke, in the verie market steade, whereas was a Guilde or brotherhood, begunne about king Edward the thirds time, and since much encreased by one Heywood, Deane of Lichfield: Saint Nicholas in the Southeast ende of the Towne: Stowe Church in the East ende of the Towne, whereas is Saint Cedds Well, a thing of pure water, where is séene a stone in the bottome, on the which (some saie) that Cedde was wont to stande and praie. At this stone Cedde had his Oratory in the time of Vlfere king of the Mercians: at which time, all the countrie about Lichfielde was a forrest and wildernesse. There was an house of Saint Iohn in the verie South ende of the Towne, wherein was a Master and Fellowes. Smith Byshop of Couentrie and Lichfielde, in king Henrie the seuenths dayes, and afterwardes Byshop of Lincolne, beganne a newe foundation at this place, setting vp a Master, two Priestes, and tenne poore men in an Hospitall, hee set there also a Schoolemaster and an Vsher to teach a Grammar schole. King Henrie the seuenth gaue vnto it an olde Hospitall called Denhall in Wyrehall in Cheshire, with the landes and the impropriation of Burton Church in Wyrehall: there was an house of gray Friars in the Southwest parte of the Towne, Alexander Bysshop of Lichfield was the founder of it. There commeth a conduite of water out of an hill to the Towne, and hath two castelets, one in the East wall of the Friars close, and the other about the market place, besides water to serue the close and the Prebendes houses. There was a faire olde Crosse, enuironed with steppes in the Market place: Denton Deane of Lichfielde compassed this Crosse with eight faire Arches of stone, making a rounde vault ouer them for market folkes to stande vnder in, it did cost him a hundreth and threescore poundes. The North part of Lichfield is diuided from the South part with three pondes or lakes, whereof both the two first lying by west, are nothing so great as the thirde that lyeth by East: there bee diuers Springes in these poles, but the principall Spring is a broke that entereth into them and feedeth them, comming from Dwe about a mile and halfe by West from Lichfield: the first westward pole is diuided from the second pole by a great maine causeway, walled on eche side with stone, and in this causeway be Arches of stone for the water to issue into the second pole: and this causeway serueth to come out of the South part of the Towne into the North. This causeway was last made by Langton Bysshop of Lichfield. There is also a stone causeway, and an issue for the water betwixt the second pole and the third, leading out of the Towne hard to the South gate of the close of the Cathedrall Church: and on the East side of it, is a faire Pil, this causeway is little more then a quarter so long as the first. The third pole that lyeth by West, is a verie faire thing, and plentifull of fish, and goeth in length about halfe a mile or euer the whole water be drawne into a narrowe bottome, that three miles lower goeth into Trent, by the right ripe.

The Cathedrall Church of Lichfield being first erected by king Oswyne, was of later times renouated and dedicated to Saint Mary and Saint Cedde. The whole close of the cathedrall church was newly ditched and walled by Bysshop Langton, and he made one gate of a maiestie, and great strength at the West part of the close, and an other, but a lesse gate, at the Southeast part of the close: he made also the Bysshops pallace, at the East end of the close: he made Cokleshall castle, Shoborowe manour place, and the pallace by Strond at London, besides many other great actes, he was treasurer to king Edward the first. The Prebendaries in the close be very faire builded. The Choristers haue a goodly house lately builded by Bysshop Blythe. Fairewell a small priorie of Nunnes, suppressed by Thomas Wolsey Archbishop of Yorke, and giuen to Lichfield, in recompence of a pension that should haue beene giuen out of his college in Oxford, was impropriate to the Choristers of Lichfield. The Librarie, at the Northwest part of the Cathedrall Church was erected by Thomas Haywood, Deane of Lichfield. The glorie of the Church is the worke of the West ende, that is exceeding costly and faire. There be three pyramides or steeples of stone, two at the west ende, and one in the middest of the church. That parte of the Towne that lyeth by North the great causeway or bridge, is but one faire streete in length. And thus much for the Citie of Lichfield: all which sprang of the Monasterie there. King Oswyne gaue to Peda sonne to Penda, because hee marryed king Oswynes daughter as is afore shewed, the kingdome of the South marches, diuided by the riuer of Trent from the north marches.

Hugo de Peterborow.

Peda the first Christian king of Mercia.

Peda nowe king of Mercia, beeing also the first Christian king of that kingdome, beganne to plant Christianitie, throwing downe, and [illegible] the Idoles, and erecting Churches of Christian Religion. Among the which, hee beganne the foundation of Medilhamstede, nowe called Peterborow: but hee raygned not long, for hee was trayterously slaine, by the meanes of Alfled his wife, in the feast of Easter in the yéere of Christ 657. And king Oswyne three yéeres after his great victorie ouer the cruell Pagan Penda, the Nobilitie of the Mercians Iumin, Eaba, and Eadbert rebelled against him, aduancing to the Crowne Vlfere brother to Peda.

662 VLferus brother to Peda, earnestly preferred christianity, which his brother had begunne, but he was the first (sayeth William of Malmesburie,) that through the sinne of Symonie, solde the Bishoprike of London vnto Wyna.

Vlfercester.

I reade in a Legar Booke of the Monasterie of Peterborowe, that Vlferus king of Mercia, remaining at his Castell of Ulfercester in Staffordshire, and vnderstanding that his sonne Vlfade, had led his brother Rufin to Chad (vnder colour of hunting) by whome they were both instructed in the Christian faith, and had receiued Baptisme, hee by perswasion of Werebode, goeth to the Oratorie of the Holie man, where finding both his seruaunts in deuout contemplation, hee killed them with his owne handes, whose Bodies Ermenhelde the Queene their mother did burie in a Sepulture of stone, and in processe of time, caused a Church of stone there to bee builded: which place was after called Stones, by reason of the stones which the multitude brought thither for the building thereof, when they came to frequent the place.

Priory of stones in Staffordshire

But Vlfere after, repenting thereof, destroyed all the Temples of the Idoles, and in place of them did build Churches and Monasteries, among the which hee bestowed great cost on Medilhamstede, enriching it with large possessions.

Medilhamstede or Peterborow.

This Church standeth in the Prouince of Gerwy or such as inhabite the Fennes, and maie not bee come vnto, except on the East side: on the South side whereof doth run the Riuer of Nenne, in the middest of the which course is a place, as it were, a Whirlepoole, which is so deepe and colde, that in the Summer none can swimme or diue to the bottome, and yet it is neuer frozen in the Winter: for (as they saie) there is a Fountaine, out of the which issueth water, which place the Ancients did name Medeswell, of which the Monasterie built hard by was called Medelhamstede, which the three brethren, Peda, Vlfere, and Ethelred, the sonnes of Penda, with their sisters, Kenesburg, and Keneswith, and king Oswyne did build from the foundation. But Peda in the yéere of Christ 675. with the deuout multitude, by the help of Sexulfus first Abbot there, began this monastery, & laid ỳ foundation there, of such stones as 8. yoke of oxen could scarse draw one of them, which stones were séene when the

This Church was destroied by the Danes, as all other monasteries were, & so remained 96. yeres, til the time that Ethelwald bishop of Win. cõming into a place called Undal or Dundal, begã there to make a newe foundation, but after comming to Medshamsted, which he found desolate, by the helpe of king Edgar and Adulphus his Chancellour, hee did newe repaire the monastery there: and the monastery at Dundal was made a parish church. In Anno 1117. this monastery of Medshamsted with the whole Towne was burnt, but in the yeere after begunne to bee newe builded by Abbot Iohn from the foundation, and the Monkes entred againe in the yéere 1140. The Towne in the Saxons time was called Hothelholme. About the same time two Noblemen Odo and Dodo founded the priory of Tewkesberie. Also Osricke Duke of Glouceſter founded the monasterie of Glocester, then for nuns: since the same is a Bishops Sea. EThelbald raigned in continuall peace many yeeres, and then by the procurement of Beruredus, was slaine of his owne subiectes. Vnto this Ethelbald Boniface, the second Bishop of Utriche in Holland, after Archbishop of Mentz vpon the Rhene an Englishman borne, who was afterward martyred, for the profession of Christ and his holie Gospell, sent an Epistle, of the which I will here set downe a péece to bee seene, for that it sheweth partlie the state of that time then present, and serueth for example in time to come. Chronicle of Holland. Ro. Mai. Leo Isaurus Iconomachus Emp.

TO his most déere Lord, and to be preferred in the loue of Christ aboue all other kings of England, Edbaldus, Boniface Archbishop, the Germane Legate, perpetuall health of charitie and loue in Christ. Wee acknowledge before God, that wée did reioice to heare of your prosperitie, your fayth and good workes: and wee bée sory when we heare any thing that goeth against you, eyther in succelle of warre, or in danger of your soule, for we haue heard, that you forbid theft and robbery, that you loue peace, defende the widowe and the pore, for the which wée giue God thankes: but in that you refuse lawfull marriage; which if it were to the preferring of chastitie, it were commendable: and sith you wallow in lecherie and adultery with Virgins consecrate to God, it is both shamefull and damnable, for it doeth confounde you renowne, both Epistle of Boniface to Ethelbald.

before GOD and man, placing you among Idolators, because you violate the Temple of GOD. Wherefore my deare sonne repent, and remember how filthy a thing it is, that thou, who by the gift of God raignest ouer so many nations, shouldest to the great displeasure of God, make thy selfe a bondslaue to thine owne fleshly lust. We haue heard also, that the more part of noble men and people of the Mercians, by thine euill example, haue left their lawfull wiues, and haue defiled the wiues of other, and also Virgins, which, howe farre it differeth from all good order and honestie, let the Lawes of strange Nations teach you: for in the ancient Countrey of the Sarons (where was no knowledge of GOD) if either a maide in her fathers house, or being maried to an husband, were become an aduoutresse, she should be strangled by her owne hand closed to her mouth, and the corrupter should be hanged vpon the pit where the aduoutresse was buried. If she were not so vsed (her garments being cut awaie downe to the girdlesteade) the chiefe Matrones did scourge and whippe her, and pricke her with knives, and so was sent from Towne to Towne, where other freth and new scourgers or whippers did meete and whip her, vntill they had killed her. Likewise the Womendeans, who are the most vncleane kinde of people, had this manner of vsage with them, that the husband being dead, the woman, together with the dead body should cast her selfe headlong into the fired stacke or pile of wood prepared for the burning of their bodies. If therefore the Gentiles (not knowing God) had so great zeale to chastitie, how much more (my deare sonne) is it to be required at thy handes, who art a Christian and a King? Haue therefore compassion of thine owne soule, and spare the great number of the people, that by thy fatherly example yet maie beware to offend God, for whose soules thou shalt giue an account. Consider also, that if the English Nation, despising lawfull matrimonie, doe encrease by aduoutrie, (as the Frenchmen, Italians, and also the verie Pagans doe cast in our teeth and vpbraide vs withall,) of such coniunctions and copulations, shall spring vp a peakish dastardlie people, which shall despise God, and with their wicked qualities vndoe the Countrey, as it came to passe to the Burgundians, the people of Prouance, and the Spaniardes, whome the Saracens haue manie yeeres assaulted for their sinnes which in times past they had committed. Besides this, it is tolde vs, that you take away priuiledges of Churches, and thereby giue euill example vnto your noble men to doe the like: but I pray you remember howe terrible vengeance God toke vpon the kings your predecessors, which committed such offences as we rebuke you for.

Aduoutry among Infidels punished by death.

A wicked spirite came vpon Solredus your predecessour, which was a defiler of Virgins, and a breaker of Ecclesiasticall Priuiledges, for sitting roially among his Barons at a dinner, the Diuell plucked awaie his soule without confession of his sinnes. The Diuell also drewe in such a rage, Osredus king of the Northumbers, which was guiltie of the same crimes, that with a vile death he lost both kingdome and life in his lustie young age. Also Charles king of Fraunce which ouerthrewe Churches, and altered the Church money to his owne vse, was consumed with a long torment and fearefull death.

If

It followeth therefore (my deare beloued sonne) that with earnest prayers wee beseech you, that you will not despise the Counsell of your fathers which diligentlie doe admonish your Highnesse, for nothing is more commodious to a good king, then willingly to amend such faults when hee is warned of them, as Salomon saith, Who so loueth Discipline, loueth Wisedome. Therefore (my deare sonne) declaring our aduice, we beseech you by the liuing God, by his sonne Iesus Christ our Lorde, and by his holie spirite, that you will remember howe transitorie this present life is, and howe short and momentane the pleasure of this filthie flesh is, and how vile and shamefull a thing it is, that man shall leaue euill examples to his posteritie for euer: beginne therefore to frame your life in better waies, and amend the errours of your youth, that you may obtaine praise with men in this life, and eternall glorie in the life to come: We wish your Highnesse well to fare, & to encrease in all goodnesse.

Moreouer, the same Bonifacius sent an Epistle of the like tenor vnto Cuthbert Archbishop of Canterbury, adding thereunto, that he should rebuke the Clearkes and Nunnes for their finenes, and pompe of apparel and garments. He also willed Cuthbert not to marualle that he medled with other mens matters, nor to thinke it no part of his charge, to deale with the English Nation, but to vnderstand that Gregorie Bishop of Rome had bounde him, by the Sacrament thrise receiued, to let him vnderstand, of the maners and vsages of the Nations about him: which indéede (he saide) he woulde doe, if his gentle admonition toke not good successe.

The Epistle of Boniface to Ethelbalde toke such effect, that Ethelbalde forthwith sending to the Archbishop Cuthbert, and other his Cleargie and nobilitie, by their counsell, amongst other things he caused to be published, as followeth:

I Ethelbalde King of the Mercians, foreséeing that I ought to prouide for the kingdome euerlasting, and the remedie of my soule, that I may deliuer it from the bondage of sinne. And forasmuch as Almightie GOD, by his mercifull clemencie, without anie of my deserts going before, hath giuen me the Scepter of the kingdome, gladly therefore will I render vnto him of the things which he hath giuen me, and for this cause I giue this gifte by my life time.

That all Churches of my kingdome shall be discharged of all manner of tribute, in worke, and burdens, except it be in the building of Towers, Castles, and Bridges, which cannot be released vnto any. Moreouer, that seruitours of Monasteries and Churches, shall haue their owne proper libertie in the profite of woods, & of fieldes, and shall not be bound to giue any reward vnto the King or Princes, except they will, but shall be frée that they maie serue God, &c.

The monastery of Crowland founded.

Ethelbald founded the Monasterie of Crowland, and because the marish of this Crowland, as the very name declareth (for it signifieth crudy ground and myre) was not able to beare a stone building, the forenamed king caused many and mighty piles of Oake to bee driuen into the ground, and commanded hard earth to be brought thither nine miles off by water in boates, from the higher ground, and to be mingled with the marish, and in this sorte he laid the foundation, and finished the Church of stone.

BEraredus the murtherer of Ethelbald did nothing worthy the remembrance, but was slaine by Offa, and had an end méete for a traitor.

OFfa nephewe to Ethelbald succéeded: hee ioyned battell with Kineulfus king of the West Saxons, and got the victorie. He sent for Ethelbert king of the East Angles, promising great things by flatterie, but when he had gotte him to his Pallace, hee caused him to be beheaded, and then vnlawfully inuaded the kingdome of the East Angles, as is shewed in the raigne of the East Angles.

BErnulfus in the third yéere of his raigne was ouercome by Egbertus King of West Sarons at Elyndune. 821

LVcanus after hee raigned two yéeres, was oppressed by the East Angles. 824

WIthlafnus, being at the first subdued by Egbirth, raigned viii. yéeres, paying to him and his sonne a tribute. 826

BErthulfus raigned xiii. yéeres, in the same estate, till at the last he was chased beyond the Seas, by the sea-rouers of Denmarke. 829 W. Malmes.

BVrdredus paying the Tribute, enioyed the same twentie yéeres, and then he being deposed, and driuen out of his Countrey, fled to Rome, and there was buried at the English schole. Then that kingdome was by the Danes deliuered to Ceolwulfus, and in fewe yéeres after that, Alphred the Nephewe of Egbirth gate it. So the kingdome of the Mercies fell awaie in the yéere of Christ, 875. 852.

THe firſt kingdome was of the Northumbers, which contained Lankeſhire, Yorkeſhire, Cumberland, Weſtmerland, Northumberland. It had on the Weſt the Sea, by South the Riuer of Humber, and ſo downeward toward the Weſt by the endes of the Shires of Nottingham and of Darby, vnto the Riuer of Perce, & hath the Dioceſſes of Yorke, Durham, and Carleile.

At the beginning, it was deuided into two kingdomes, Bernitia, and Deira. Bernitia ſtretched from Edenborough Frith to Tine: and Deira, from Tine to Humber, but theſe two were ſhortly vnited.

In Anno 626. Paulinus being the third Byſhoppe of Rocheſter, was conſtituted by Iuſtus then Archbyſhoppe of Canterburie, to bée Byſhoppe ouer the Northumbers, and ſent by Eadbald to Edwine the king of that nation, with his wife, being the daughter of king Ethelbert, and ſiſter of the ſaid king Eadbald. First Chriſtian king of Northumberland. Marianus. Florilegus. W.

A certaine deſperate fellow, named Eomer, was ſent vnto king Edwine, by Guicheline king of the Weſt Saxons, who came vnto him on Eaſter daie, and hauing a naked weapon vnder his garment, aſſayled the king, but Lilla his ſeruaunt thruſt himſelfe before the ſtroke, yet notwithſtanding the king was with that ſtroke wounded through the bodie of his faithfull ſeruant.

The ſame night the Q. his wife was deliuered of a daughter, which vpon Whitſonday next after, was the firſt that was baptized of Paulinus the Byſhop, and named Eanfleda.

In the yéere of Chriſt 628. Edwine the moſt mightie king of the Northumbers, and his people, receiued the word of God, at the preaching of Paulinus the Byſhop: this was done in the xi. yéere of his raigne, and in the 230. yéere after the arriuall of the Angles in Brytaine.

Edwine gaue vnto Paulinus a Byſhoppes Sea in the Citie of Yorke, and began the Cathedrall Church of S. Peter there, which Church was after finiſhed by king Oſwald his ſucceſſor, after this, in encreaſing of the Chriſtian faith and heauenlie kingdome, his earthlie poſſeſſions did wonderfullie encreaſe, for he firſt of all the Angles brought Brytaine wholie vnder his ſubiection, ſauing the kingdome of Kent. Cathedrall Church of Yorke founded.

Edwine in the 17. yeere of his raigne, and the 48. of his age, was ſlaine in a battaile which he fought at Heathfielde, with the moſt valiant Painim Penda king of the Mercies, and Ceadwalla king of the Brytaines. Paulinus the Byſhoppe builded the great Church at Lincolne. In the raigne of king Edwine, ſuch was the peace and tranquillitie through all Brytaine, which waie ſoeuer king Edwines dominions lay, that a weake woman might haue walked with her new borne babe ouer all the Iſland without anie damage. which cuppes no man durst touch further then to his owne present vse and necessitie, for the loue and good will they bare to their Prince, who was for the time of his raigne so honoured and loued, that the triumphant banners were borne before him, not in warre onely, but in peace to, whersoeuer hee went abroad.

After the death of Edwine, the kingdome of Northumberland was againe diuided.

633 OStiche sonne of Elfrike, who was Edwines vncle, succéded in the gouernance of Deira. And Eanfride the son of Ethelfride, ruled the Bernicians: but both these forsaking the Christian profession, wherein they were instructed, yéelded themselues to be defiled with the filth of Idolatry: but this Apostasie was reuenged by Cedwall king of the Brytaines, who slew them both, & with tragicall slaughter spoiled Northumberland.

634 OSwald brother to Eanfride, then gouerned this kingdome, who with a small armie ouercame the Brytaines, and slewe Cedwall their king at Denisburne. He sent for Aidan a Scot to aduance the Christian Religion among his people, assigning to him the Ile of Lindisfarne or holie Ilande, for his Sea. He greatly enlarged his kingdome, reconciled the Deirians and Bernicians, which did deadly hate one another. And when he had raigned viii. yéres, was slaine in a cruell battell at Maserfielde, by Penda king of Mercia, and canonized a Saint. Oswestree

642 OSwine brother to Oswald, succéded: he buried the head and armes of Oswald, which Penda commanded to be hanged vpon poles. His gouernment was greatly disquieted by inuasion of the Mercians, rebellion of his owne son Aelfride, and insurrection of Adilwald sonne to Oswald. He murthered Oswy, the sonne of Osrike, who ruled Deira, being traiterously deliuered vnto him at Ingethling, where afterward a Monasterie was erected. But at length he deliuered his Countrey from forraine inuasion, vanquished the Mercians with Penda in a fought fielde, neere the riuer Ietwet, brought them to his subiection, and caused them to be instructed in the Christian faith.

Liber Lichfield. T. Rudburne.

Lichfielde Church a Bishops sea founded.

He builded a Church among the Mercians called Lichfielde, and procured the same to be a Bishops sea, in Anno, 657.

Duina was first Bishop there of Mercia, and also of Lindesierne: for there were then so fewe Priests, that one Bishoppe was compelled to gouerne two Prouinces. King Oswine ended his life quietly, when he had raigned xvii. yéres.

670 EGfride his lawefull sonne, then inherited Northumberland: hee deposed Wilfride of the Bishoprieke, and appointed two Bishops ouer the Northumbers. Mildred, otherwise called Etheldred, his wife would by no meanes accompany with her husband, but continued a Virgine, and after she had bin maried twelue yéres, toke at the handes of Wilfride the vaile and habite of a Nunne, and built the Monasterie of Ely, where she was Abbesse.

Egfride her husband fought a battell with Edilfride king of Mercia, but after they were reconciled by Theodore the Byshop. Then turning his power against Ireland, he sent Bert thither, who miserably destroyed the sely people.

ple. But the yére following, he marched against the Picts contrarie to the good counsell of S. Cuthbert, whom hee made Bishop; was slaine by them in an ambush, in a place called Nectansmere, when he had raigned xv. yéres, and was buried in S. Columbes Iland.

ALfride, bastard sonne of Oswine, succéded after his brother Egfride. Hee did repaire the decayed state of Northumberland, but could not recouer al that Picts, Scots, and Britaines toke from the Northumbers at the death of his brother. He raigned xix. yéres. 685

OSred his sonne, a child of eight yéres succéded, who, when he had wickedly raigned xi. yeres, was murthered by his kinsmen Kenred and Osricke. Kenred, when he had slaine Osred, ruled Northumberland two yéres. 704

OSricke obtained the kingdome after xi. yéres, and elected Ceolnulph brother of Kenred to be his successor. 715

CEolnulph raigned in this province with great pietie, and victory viii. yeres, and then forsoke the state of a king, and toke the habite of a Monke in the holie Iland. 728

Benedict, who first brought Masons, Painting, and Glasing into this Realme to the Saxons, flourished at this time. Beda also that famous learned man, lived at this time, who dedicated his historie of the Church of England to the forenamed Ceolnulph. Glasing brought among the Saxons. Bede famous.

EGbert, cousin germane to Ceolnulph, raigned in Northumberland twentie yeres peaceably, and then forsaking the worlde, entred into Religion, and became a Monke: his brother bearing ỳ same name, was Archbishop of Yorke, which See he greatly aduanced, and founded there a most worthy Librarie, replenished with all good Authors. 736 W. OSrede, the sonne of Aelerede then succeeded, but the first yéere he was deprived. 796

AEthelred or Etheldred, who was before deposed, now receiued the kingdome, and when he had ruled foure yeeres, was also miserably slaine. After his death, this kingdome decayed, and was pitifully ransacked by ciuill sedition, and forraine inuasions, for the space of 30. yéres, in which space, there ruled here without title of kings. 798. West Saxons.

THe seauenth kingdome was of the West Saxons, which contained the Countries of Barkeshire, South-hampton, Wiltshire, Dorcetshire, Somersetshire, Deuonshire, and Cornwall, and hath Diocesses, Bath and Wels, Sarisburie, and Excester: hauing on the East side Southsex, on the North side Thames, on the South and the West the Sea Ocean.

This kingdome, although it toke beginning long after the first comming of the Saxons, yet the same endured longest, and ouercomming all the other kingdomes, brought them againe to one Monarchy.

From this Prince of the West Saxons are descended the present kings of Great Britain. Rapin CErdic, the tenth from Woden, with his sonne Kenrike, and other Saxons in fiue shippes, in Anno Christi. 499. landed in Brytaine, at a place called Cerdikeshore, and slewe Natanleod king of the Brytaines, and fiue thousand men, of whose name the Countrey as farre as Cerdikesford, was called by the name of Natanleod. From thencefwith hee kept the Brytaines in great quiet, for they thought not good to stirre, where they wanted hope to preuaile.

519 CErdike and Kenrike beganne to raigne as kinges, and the same yéere they fought with the Brytaines in a place called Cerdikesforde, and departed vanquishers.

After that, they fought with the Brytaines in a place called Cerdicksleage. These two kings to wit, the father and the sonne, toke the Isle of Wight, and gaue gaue the same to their Nephewes, Stuffe and Withgare, and slewe the Brytains in a place called Withgarberg. He raigned 17. yeeres. Withgare the Nephewe of Cerdic was king of the Ile of Wight, and was buried at Withgarberg, or the Citie of Withgar in the Ile of Wight.

KEnrike the son of Cerdic fought with the Brytaines at Searesberige, and afterwards at Beranbrige, and at both times put them to flight, and raigned xxv. yeeres. 526

CEauline the son of Kenrike toke vpon him the kingdome of the West Saxons. 560

In the beginning of his raigne he discomfited Ethelbert king of Kent, and slewe his 2. Dukes, Oslaue & Cnebban at Wibbandune. Afterward his brother Cutholfe vanquished the Brytaines at Bedford, and wan from them the towns of Liganburge, Egelsburge, Benslngton, and Egnesham. Liganburge. Leyan Burrard.

Sixe yeeres after, Ceaulin slew 3. kings of the Brytaines, Commeaile, Condidan, and Fariemeile, at Deorham, and toke three Cities from them, Glocester, Cirrencester, and Bathancester.

After he fought with the Brytaines at Fethanleah, in which he had the victorie, but lost his sonne Cutha: for now his fortune changed, and when hee had raigned 33. yeeres, he was ouercome at Wodnesbeorhe, or Wannes ditch in Willshire, and expelled out of his kingdome by the Brytains, by the meanes of Cealrike his brother Cuthas sonne, that now rebelled against him, and expulsed him the kingdome, when he had raigned xxx. yeeres. Tho. Redborne. Leyland.

Cealrike the sonne of Cutholfe ruled the West Saxons v. yeeres. 591

CEolnulfe sonne of Cutha before named succeeded, who had continuall wars either with the Englishmen, with the Brytaines, with the Scots, or with the Picts, and lastlie moued war against the South Saxons, and there died, when he had raigned 14. yeeres. 598

KInegilsus the sonne of Ceolrike succeeded. He brought his host against the Brytaines into Beandune, and there slew of them 2046. 611 Marian. Floria. Wigor. Wesster baptized.

He also fought with Penda king of Mercians nere vnto Cirencester, and after made peace with him.

And shortly after in the yere of Christ six hundred thirty fiue, by the preaching of Berinus, king Kinegilsus, and all his people receyued the Christian faith, to whome king Oswald was Godfather at the Font, of which kinges, the sayde Berinus had graunted to him the Citie of Dorchester, & builded there an house of Canons for his Bishoppes Sea. Kenegilsus raygned sauen and twentie yeeres. Vita Berini. Dorchester a Bishops Sea.

GVicheline the sonne of Kinegilsus was babtized by Berinus the Bishoppe, in the Citie of Dorchester, and deceased the same yeere. 638

CVthedrus the sonne of king Guicheline, was baptized at Dorchester, by Berinus the Bishop, who was his Godfather at the font. Hee raigned viii. yeeres. About this time Honorius Archbishoppe of Canterburie deuided his prouince into parishes. 639

KEnnewalcus the son of king Kenegilsus, toke on him the kingdome of the West Saxons. 643

He founded the Cathedrall Church in Winchester, placing there a Bishops Sea.

He gaue Meydulfus burgh to Aldelmus the Abbot, there to build a Monastery. Afterward being infested with warres by Penda King of the Mercians, because he had forsaken his wife, sister of the said Penda, was by him driuen out of his kingdome, and fled to Anna king of the East Angles, where he was baptized of Bishop Fœlix, and after was restored to his kingdome by the helpe of the forenamed Anna. He raigned xxi. yeares. After whom Quéene Sexburge his wife gouerned a while. She founded a Monasterie of Nunnes in the Ile of Shepey, and became her selfe a Nunne, and after Abbesse of Ely.

685 ¶ Ceadwalla, Nephew to Ceauline succéeded in the kingdome.

Marianus. He slewe Berthune Duke of the South Saxons, and brought that prouince vnder grieuous bondage.

After that, he & his brother Mull walled Kent, and subdued the Ile of Wight, which till that time was giuen to Idolatry, wherof he purged them, giuing the fourth part thereof to Bishop Wilfride, who appointed Preachers to conuert the people of that Ile to Christianitie. Ceadwalla once againe spoiling the countrey of Kent, his brother Moll, and xii. of his knightes were slaine by fire cast vpon them, after which time, euen before he was baptized, hee gaue for tithe a tenth to God all the pray and spoiles he had gotten to his owne vse: in whom (saith Malmesbury) although we praise his affection, we allow not the example: for it is written, that who so offereth the sacrifice of poore folkes good, doth as if it were sacrifice the sonne in the sight of his father.

W. Malmes.

After this he went to Rome, when Sergius was Pope, he was there baptized on Easter Euen, the yeare after Christs birth, 689. and falling sicke he died on the 20. day of Aprill, and was buried honorably in S. Peters Church, with an Epitaph in Latine verse, and another in Latine prose, which maie be Englished thus.

Ceadwall buried at Rome. Here Ceadwall is buried, otherwise named Peter, king of the West Saxons, who died the 20. of Aprill in the second indiction, and liued 30. yeares, or thereabouts, when that noble and mightie Prince Iustinian was Emperour of Rome, and had raigned 4. yeares in the Empire, and Sergius a true paterne of the Apostles, had sate 2. yeares in Peters seate.

687 INe raigned among the West Saxons, a noble man, of great power & wisdome, and therewith valiant and hardie, in feates of armes very expert: he maintained such warre against the Kentish Saxons, that he constrained them to seeke and intreat meanes of peace, giuing to him for the same great gifts 30000. Mancas (peeces of gold so named.)

Asser.

Floriacensis. This Ine was the sonne of Kenred, the sonne of Ceadwolde, brother to Kenwold, and sonne to Chenling, sonne of Kenri, sonne of Cirdic, the first king of the the West Saxons. This man was made for his industrie and naturall prowesse, then for his succession of the right line, called to be King. He was a patrone of strength and manlinesse, an image of wisedome, and his like was of no man knowne at that time, for religion the professing, and framing himselfe thereafter in his liuing.

About the 26. yere of his raigne he fought a great battell against Ceolred king of Mercia, at Woodnesburie. And the same yere he inuaded the South Saxons with a mightie armie, and slewe in battaile Anthun King of the South Saxons, and ioined that kingdome vnto his. He builded a Colledge at Wels, dedicating it to the honour of God, and Saint Andrewe the Apostle, in the yeere of Christ 704. which Church was since translated into Bishops See, by Kenulphus king of the West Saxons. He new builded the Abbey of Glastenburie, in a fenny place out of the way, to the end the Monks mought so much the more giue their mindes to heauenly things, and chiefely vse the contemplation meete for men of such profession; this was the fourth building of that Monasterie. Besides which the said king did also erect a Chappell of gold and siluer (to wit garnished) with ornaments and vessels likewise of gold and siluer, to the building of the which Chappell, he gaue 2640. pounds of siluer, and to the Altar, 264. pound of golde, a Chalcis with the patten, tenne pound of gold, a Sensar eight pound, and twenty Mancas of gold, two Candlesticks, twelue pound and a halfe of siluer, a Liuar for the Gospell booke twenty pound, and 60. Mancas of gold, vessels for water to the Altar, thirteene pound of golde, a Bason eight pound of gold, an holy water Bucket rr. pound of siluer, Images of our Lord, our Ladie, and the twelue Apostles 175. pound of siluer, and 28. pound of gold, a Pall for the Altar, and ornamentes for the Monks, of gold and precious stones subtilly compacted, all which treasure he gaue to that Monasterie. In the yeere of Christ, 705. Hedda Bishop of the West Saxons departed this life, after whose death, king Ine caused that bishopricke to be diuided into two parishes, the one to Winchester which he gaue to Daniel, the other, to wit Shireborne, was giuen to Aldethelme, where he ruled foure yéeres.

Also Eadberte Abbot, was made Bishop of Selsey by Chichester.

This Ine king of the West Saxons, was the first that caused the mony called Peter pence to be paid to Rome, & this was called the kings almes, & was leuied in this maner, euery man that had 30. pennieworth of good of one maner cattel in their house of their owne proper, should giue a peny at Lammas yéerely. And when he had gouerned the West Saxons by the space of 37. yeres, by the earnest labor of his wife Ethelburge, he left this worldly kingdome to his cosin Echelard, and went to Rome, and there ended his life in poore estate.

Ethelard kinsman on the fathers side to Ine, succeeded in the kingdome, notwithstanding Oswald a pong man of the kings blood did disturbe the beginning of his raigne, for he stirred vp rebellion among the inhabitants, but not long after, he died, and then Ethelard raigned quietly xiiii. yéeres.

Cuthred his kinsman made warre on Ethelwald king of Mercia against the Brytaines, and had of them the victorie.

SIgebert was king of the West Saxons. He was cruell and tyrannous towards his Subiects, and changed auncient Lawes and Customes after his owne lust and pleasure, and because a certayne Noble Man some deale sharpelie aduertised him to chaunge his manners, hee put him to cruell death, and for so much as hee continued in his malice, and would not amend, hee was depriued of all kinglie authoritie, and lastlie as a person forlorne, wandring in woods, and hiding himselfe in caues of wild beasts, he was slaine in Andreads Walde by a Swineheard, whose Lord & master called Cumbra, he had wrongfullie put to death, when he had not raigned one yeare.

A tyrant came to a miserable end. and shamefull death.

KEnulphus of the blood of Cerdicus, appeased certaine murmours and grudges that were amongst the people, for the deposing of his predecessor Sigebert.

He founded the Cathedrall Church of Welles. As he haunted a woman which he kept at Merton, he was slaine by the treason of one Olio, the kinsman of Sigebert late king, when he had raigned nine and twentie yeeres, and was buried at Winchester.

BRithricus of the blood of Cerdicus, was made king of West Saxons, a man more desirous of peace then of warre.

He married Eadburga the daughter of Offa king of Mercia, by whose power hee expelled Egbert, that was an vnder king in the Lordship of the West Saxons.

ETheldred brother to Adhelbrick, receiued the kingdome of the West Saxons. In the first yeare of his raigne, a great Nauy of Pagans came into England, and remained all the winter in the kingdome of East England.

The Pagans departed out of Northumberland, came to Nottingham, and there wintered, but Beorede gathering a great armie against them, strengthened besides with Ethelreds power, king of the West Saxons, forced them to leape Nottingham, and to go backe againe to Yorke, where remaining til winter was passed, they then passed ouer by Boate into Linsey, and comming by to Humberstane, spoiled the whole Countrie, they destroied the most famous and auncient Monasterie of Bardeney, slaying all the Monkes without mercie, they ranging the Countrey, slewe the Abbot and Monkes of Croyland, and fiered their Church, with the houses belonging to the Monasterie. At Medilhamstede or Peterborough, they made the like slaughter, bauocke, and spoile, and so proceeding toward Huntingdon, praying and spoyling the Country, euen vnto Grantbridgeshire, and to the house of Nuns in the Ile of Ely, where they murdered all, as well women as men. Thus entering into East Angle, they slewe the most valiant Earle Walkerulus, and all his companie that resisted. The yeare 871. the said armie of the Danes came to Reading a towne of the kinges situate on the South side of the Riuer Thamis in Barkeshire, and there two of their Earles with a great power rode forth to spoyle the Countrie, trie, in the meane time, the other cast a trench betweene the Thamis and Cirencester or Kynet, on the right side of the same Towne, with whome Ethelwolfe Earle of Barkeshire did meete in a place called Englefield, (or field of the Englishmen) where one of the Earles being slaine, and the rest chased awaie, the Christians obtained the victorie.

The Christians within 4. daies fought a battell with the Paganes, in Alsendune, but the Paganes deuided themselues into two battels, for then they had two kings, which when the Christians saw, they likewise deuided their army into two companies. Battaile at Alsendune.

It was determined that king Ethelred with his battell, shoulde go against the two Pagan kings with their battell, and that his brother Aelfrede with his armie should set on al the Pagan dukes and their army. All things thus ordered, when the king tarried long in his prayer, and the Paganes being readilie prepared, came to Chipenhane where the battell was pitched, Aelfred seeing hee must either retire, or set on his enimies before his brother did come, he straightwaies set vpon them, though the place of battell was vnequall, for the Pagans had gotten the higher grounde, and the Christians brought their battell from the valley. There was in that place one onelie thorne tree, verie short, about which tree the battels met and ioined, where when they had a long time fought, Hubba one of the kings, 5. The Pagans subduing the whole kingdome of the Mercies, which they committed to Ceonulfus: The nert yere one part of ỳ Pagans wintered in Northumberland néere to the River Tine, subdued the whole Countrey: the other part went with Guthram, Osketellus, and Amandus, three kings of the Pagans, to Grantbridge, and wintered there.

The yéere following, the Pagans going from Cambridge in the night, entred the Castel of Warham, where there was a Monasterie of Nuns, situate betwéene two riuers Fraw and Trent, in the Countrey called in the Saxon Thornseta, a most sure seat, except the West onely, where it ioyneth to the land, with whom king Aelfrede made a league that they should depart his kingdom, but contrary to their othe, they rode into Deuonshire, to Exancester, and there wintered.

In the yéere following the Danes came to Chipingham, a manno^r of the kings, situate on the left side of Wiltshire, and there wintred, compelling many of the West Sarons to leaue their Countrey and to go beyonde the seas: the rest that remained they subdued. King Aelfrede himselfe was oft times brought into such misery, that none of his people knew where he was become. On a time being forced to hide himselfe with a Cowheard in Somersetshire, as he sate by the fire, preparing his bowe and shaftes, the Cowhearde wife baking bread on the coales, threw the kings bowe and shaftes aside, and said, thou fellow why doest thou not turne the bread which thou séest burne, thou art glad to eate it ere it be halfe baked. This woman thought not that it had bin king Aelfred, who had made so manie battels against the Danes, and gotten so manie victories. For God did not only vouchsafe to giue him victorie ouer his enemies, but also to be wearied of them in the sight of his owne people, to the end he should know there is one God of all, to whome all knées shall bow, and in whose handes the hearts of kings consisteth. Edgar EDgar the Peaceable, brother to Edwyne, was crowned at Bathe. He was so excellent in iustice, and sharpe in correction of vices, as well in his Magistrates, as other subiects, that neuer before his daies was vsed lesse felonie by robbers, or extortion or briberie, by false officers. He chastised the great negligence, couetousnesse and vicious liuing of the cleargie, and brought them to a better order. Of stature he was but little, yet of minde valiant and hardie, and verie expert in martiall politie. Dunstane was ordained Petropolitan and Primate of England, by whome, and other wise men the king being instructed, did in euerie place oppresse euill persons, reproued rebels vnder sharpe correction, the iust and modest man he loued and cherished, Churches that had beene destroyed, hee repaired; casting out of monasteries secular Priests, and gathered together companies of Monkes, and of Nunnes, giuing good admonition to the Pastors, whome he appointed to haue rule ouer them. He was in his gouernment discréte, ciuill, liberall, gentle, mercifull and valiant; in warres hardie, defending with warlike power the right of his kingdome, bringing his people vnder the obedience of their gouernours, framing his Magistrates to iustice, ordaining rightfull lawes, whereby hee enioyed a quiet kingdome, so that hee néeded not to prouoke other to warre, nor anie warre was procured against him, but kept the boundes of his kingdome, so long as he liued, with prudence, fortitude, iustice, and temperance: not onely the Princes of the Iles being tyrants stode in feare of him, but also the kings of manie nations, hearing of his wisedome, and valiancie, did all honour him. Hee caused Widwall king of Wales to paie him, in name of tribute, three hundreth Wolues yearely (or rather their skinnes) which thing when he had performed for the space of three yéeres, the fourth yeere, was none there to be found.

King Edgare prepared a naule (as diuers authors haue written) of three thousand and fiue hundreth shippes, of the which, after Easter euery yéere, one thousand two hundred, he appointed to come into the East part of the realme; one thousand two hundred into the West parts, and one thousand two hundred into the North parts: This number of shippes being incredible, peraduenture the author following another, the first being deceiued by mistaking the same, the rest haue erred, but William Thorne a Monke of S. Augustines by Canterburie, setteth downe the whole number of ships to be 300. and this hath a more likelihood of truth. But to the matter, with the East naule, he sayled into the West, and sending that backe, hee would saile with the West naule into the North, and that being sent backe, with the North naule he would saile into the East partes; and after this sort, hee vsed to saile round about the whole Iland euerie sommer, by the which doing, hee prouided for the defence of his kingdome against strangers, and practised himselfe, and his people in exercises of warre.

Marianus.

In the winter season and spring of the yéere, hee trauailed through all the parts of his Realme, diligently searching howe the lawes and statutes were obserued by the Lords, and men of greatest authoritie, least the poore should be oppressed, by the mightie and rich men.

Thus

Thus Edgare notwithstanding his manifolde vertues before rehearsed, was reported (saith W. Malmesbury) to be a cruell Prince, and also giuen ouermuch to the lustes of the flesh, and for example they saie, that Edgare hearing tell, that Orgare Earle of Deuonshire had a daughter of passing beautie, named Alfred, he commanded Ethelwold an Earle, and also his secretarie to go loke vpon her, and so to prouide, that if she were according to the common bruted fame, she mought bee his wife. Which Ethelwold toke his iourney, and founde it to be true: whereupon, (being himselfe taken with her loue) leauing his message from the king vndone, he laboured to obtaine her to bee his wife: and returning to the king, reported the damosell to be such a one as passed not the common beauty of women, and therefore not meete for so great a Maiestie as he: So that after, when the king had set his loue vppon another, Ethelwold obtained the saide damosell in mariage, to his owne destruction, for when the fame of her passing beauty was spread through the whole realme, the king desiring to see her, and by deceit to deceiue the deceiuer, shewing a great countenance to the Earle, appointed a daie to go loke on the woman, which he heard so much commended.

The Earle being in great heauinesse, went before to his wife, and desired her that shee should, for the safegarde of his life, disfigure her selfe with some homely apparell, and otherwise as she might: but she breaking promise with her wretched husband, dressed her selfe in a glasse as curiously as she mought, omitting nothing that mought tempt the king, and prouoke his desire, and according to her meaning it came to passe; for the king no sooner sawe her, but he was taken with her loue, and to obtaine his purpose the sooner, shewing a good countenance to the Earle, hee called him to go with him to hunt in the wood of Warwell, where he shot him through with an arrowe, into the right place, a bastard sonne of the dead Earle came, euen as the deed was done, whom the king asked, how he liked such hunting, who (as men saie) made this answere, I like it well, my Lorde, that liketh you: with which saying he so appeased the kings angrie mind, that the king never loued any man better then him, and made amends to the sonne for the cruell act against his father. The king toke Ladie Alfred to wife, and she builded an house of Nuns in the same place where her first husband Ethelwold was slaine.

owne arme hath not saued vs: but his right hand, and his holie arme; for that he hath bene pleased with vs: mete therefore it is, that we submit both our selues and our soules to him, that hath put all thinges vnder our feete; and that we diligently labour that they whome he hath made subiect vnto vs, may be made subiect vnto his lawes. And truely it is my part to rule the laitie, with the lawe of equitie, to doe iust iudgement betwixt man and his neighbours, to punish church robbers, to represse rebels, to deliuer the weake from the handes of his stronger: the poore and needie from them that spoile them. And it also belongeth to my care, to haue consideration to the health, quietnesse, or peace of the ministers of the church, the flocke of Monkes, the companies of Virgines, and to prouide the thinges necessarie for them. The examining of whose manners belongeth vnto you, if they liue chastly, if they behaue themselues honestly towardes them which be abroad, if in diuine seruice they bee carefull, if in teaching the people diligent, if in feeding sober, if moderate in apparell, if in iudgement they bee discrete: If ye had cured these thinges by prudent scrutine (by your licence I speake O reuerend fathers) such horrible and abhominable thinges of the clearkes had not come to our eares. I omit to speake, that their crowne is not large, nor their rounding conuenient, but wantonnes in apparell, insolencie in behauiour, filthinesse in wordes, doe bewray the madnesse of the inward man. Furthermore, howe great negligence is there in the diuines, when in the holy vigils, they will scarce vouchsafe to be present; when at the holie solemnities of the diuine seruice, they seeme to be gathered together to plaie and to laugh, rather then to sing?

I will that which good men lament, and euill men laugh at, I will speake with sorrowe (if so bee it maie be spoken) how they flowe in banquetings, in drunkennesse, in chambering and wantonnesse, that now clearkes houses maie be thought to bee brothell houses of harlots, and an assembly of players. There is dice, there is dauncing and singing, there is watching till midnight, with crying and shouting. Thus the patrimonie of kinges, the almesse of Princes, yea, (and that more is) the price of that precious bloud is ouerthrowne. Haue our fathers, therefore, for this purpose emptied their treasures? for this intent, hath the kings erchetours by withdrawing of manie reuenewes bene giuen? hath the kings bountifulnes giuen landes and possessions to Christian Churches for this ende? that Clearkes harlots should bee pampered with delicious dainties, that riotous guests maie be prepared for, that hounds, and hawkes, and such like toies maie bee gotten? Of this the bauidours crie out, the common people murmure, the iesters & scoffers sing and daunce, and you regard it not; you spare it, you dissemble it: Where is the sworde of Leuie, and zeale of Symeon, which killed the circumcised Sichimites being the figure of them that defile the Church of Christ, with polluted actes, abusing Iacobs daughter as a harlot? Where is the spirit of Moyses, that spared not his houshold kinsefolke, worshipping the head of the Calfe? Where is the dagger of Phinies the Priest, who killing him that plaied the harlot with the Madianite, with this holy emulation pacified Gods wrath? Where is the spirite of Peter, by whose power couetousnesse is destroyed, and Simon shall be vtterly condemned: Endeuour to imitate O yée Priestes, in God. It is time to rise against them that haue broken the lawe of God. I haue Constantines, you haue Peters sworde in your handes, let vs ioine right handes, let vs couple swordes to swordes that the Leapers maie be cast out of the Church, that the hallowed place of our Lord maie be purged, and the sonnes of Leuie may minister in the Church, who saide to his father and mother, I knowe you not, and to his brethren, I am ignorant of you. Go to carefully I beseech you, least it repent vs to haue done that that we haue done, and to haue giuen that wee haue giuen, if we shall see that not to bee spent in Gods seruice, but on the riotousnesse of most wicked men, through vnpunished liberty. Let the reliques of holie Saintes, which they scorne, and the trembrende Aultars before which they rage, moue you. Let the marueilous deuotion of our auncestors moue you, whose almes the Clearkes furie abolisheth.

My Great grandfathers father Ethelwlfus (as you knowe) gaue the tenth part of all his landes to Churches and Abbeies: my great grandfather Alfred of holie memorie, thought not meete to spare his treasures, his patrimonie, no costes, nor reuenewes that he might enrich the Church: my graund father, the olde Edward, howe much he gaue vnto the Churches, your fatherhod is not ignorant. It becommeth you to haue in remembrance, with what giftes my father and vncle enriched Christs Altar. O Dunstane, father of fathers, beholde, I praie you, the eies of my father shining on thée, from the bright coast of heauen, heare his complaining wordes with a certaine pitie thundering in thine eares. Thou O my father Dunstane! thou gauest me wholesome counsell to build Abbeies and Churches, thou wast my helper and fellow worker in all things. Thée I elected as a shéepheard, father and bishop of my soule, and keeper of my manners, when did I not obey thee? what treasure did I preferre before thy counsels? what possessions despised I not, thou commanding me? If thou thoughtest méete to giue anie thing to the poore, I was readie. If thou iudgedst anie thing to be giuen to Churches, I deferred not. If thou complainedst any thing to bee wanting to Monkes or Clearkes, I supplied. Thou saidst that almes was euerlasting, and none to bee more fruitfull then that which was giuen to Abbeies and Churches, therewith Gods seruants maie be sustained, and what remaineth maie be giuen to the poore.

O pretious almes, worthie price of the soule! O wholesome remedie for our sinnes! which from the Priestes Leman stinketh in the little skin of a strange mouse, which adorneth her little eares, which garnisheth her small fingers, which trusseth vp her delicate bodie in silke and purple. Beholde O father the fruit of mine almes, and the effect of thy promise. What wilt thou answere to this complaint? I know, when thou doest sée a theefe, thou runnest not with him, neither hast thou put thy portion with adulterers. Thou hast rebuked, thou hast intreated, and blamed them, wordes are condemned, thou must come to stripes, and thou shalt not want the kings authoritie. Thou hast here with thée ỳ venerable father Ethelwold Bishop of Winchester. Thou hast the reuerend

In the yeere 1006. The deceitfull Edrike of Straton, bade the noble Duke Alfhelmus to a banquet at Shrobsbury, from whence he had him out to hunt, where a certaine Butcher of Shrewsbury named Goodwin Northurd, whome Edrike long before had hyred, leapt out of a place, where he had laine in waite for him, and wickedly slewe Alfhelmus. And within a while after, his sonnes, Wulfeagus, and Wegate, by commandement of the king Ethelred, at Cobham, where the court then lay, had their eies put out.

Edrike of Straton Duke of Mercia and his brethren.

In the yeere 1007. king Ethelred made Edrike of Straton duke of Mercia, and gaue to him his daughter Edina to wife. This Edrike the son of Egelricus was but a man of low kinred, to whome neuertheles, his eloquent tongue had purchased riches and nobility: wily he was of wit, pleasant of speech, and passed all men in those dates in enuie, falsehode, pride, and crueltie, he had to his brethren Britricus, Alfricus, Beda, Agelricus, Agelwardus, Agelmarus, father to Godwine Duke of West Saxons.

In the yeere 1010. The army of Danes march through the wood called Ellon to Orford, which towne they burnt & destroied. Then marching about into East Angle, spoyled that country, burnt Thetford, Grantbridge. Then they spoiled the shires of Hertford, Buckingham, and Bedford. Then they wasted Northamptonshire, Wiltshire, &c. The Danes hauing spoyled the East Angles as is afore shewed, Ailwine bishop of Helmham, brought the bodie of K. Edmund from Bedrichsworth through Caister, ouer Stratford bridge, and so to London in at Criplegate, (a place so called of cripples begging there) at which gate (it is said) the bodie entring, miracles were wrought, as, some of the lame to go vpright praysing God. The body of king Edmund rested for the space of three yeeres in the parish church of S. Gregory, adioyning vnto the cathedrall church of S. In 1011. East Angle, East Saxon, Middlesex, Bedfordshire, Oxfordshire, Grantbridgeshire, halfe Huntingdonshire, and Northamptonshire: and on the south side of Thames, Kent, Surrey, Southsex, Southampton, Wiltshire, and Barkshire, being destroied with sworde and fire, king Ethelred required peace with the Danes, promising to them stipendes and tribute: to the which they feininglie assented, but yet they neuer left their cruelties: at length they besieged and destroied Canterburie, and for that the Archbyshoppe Elsegus would not yelde to them, he was first imprisoned there, and after conueied to Greenewich, and there stoned to death. Christs Church is spoiled and burnt: the Monkes with all other men are tenthed, ir. of euery x. being put to death, the tenth suffered to liue in miserie: the number of them that were left aliue, was 4. monks, & of lay people 800. so that the number slain was 36. monks, & 8000. of the lay people.

Tyranny of the Danes in England.

In the yeere 1012. they toke tribute of 48000. poundes, and at the last, after diuers ouerthrowes giuen to the men of this Ilande, they possessed the same, and put king Ethelred to flight, constraining him to liue in exile among the Normans.

His Ethelred had two wiues, Ethelgina an English woman, and Emma a Norman: of the first he had two children, of which, sauing of Edmund, who succeeded him in the kingdome, it were nothing to our purpose to speake: of the second that was Emma sister to Richard Duke of Normandie, there were borne two sonnes, to wit, Edward and Alured. And that I doe here (contrary to that is commonlie vsed) set Edward before Alured as elder brother, I am moued thereunto by no small authoritie, which I haue taken out of the Historiographers of that age, out of Gemeticensis, a most diligent writer of genealogies, and one other Authour, who in his commentarie written in praise of Emma the Quéene, affirmeth, that Edward was the elder brother, whome I do the better beléeue, because it is not like, that he séeing the thinges with his eies, shoulde mistake the matter, especiallie writing to the Q. who was mother to them both.

Swanus in the meane time subdued all Englande, and the people for feare yéelded vnto him on euerie side, ouer whome most cruellie he triumphed. But not long after he departed this life at Geinsburge, and left Canutus his sonne successour in the kingdome.

Ethelred hearing that Swanus was dead, leauing in Normandie with Duke Richarde his Sisters Sonne, Emma his Wife, and the Children that hee had by her, returned with all speede into Englande with Edmund his Sonne by his first Wife, beeing then at Mans state, and by the trustinesse of his owne men, and the ayde of the Normans, moued warre against his enimy.

Canutus finding himselfe vnable to match with him, went into Denmarke, minding to returne hither immediatlie againe.

Ethelred being, contrary to his expectation thus restored to his kingdome, shewed great cruelty vpon the Danes that remained in England, sparing neither ther man nor woman, young nor olde. Therefore Canutus being verie desirous to reuenge the same, prepared a new army, and came into England against Etheldred with all spæde he coulde, raging wide and side with fire and sworde. Etheldred in the meane season, whether by sicknesse or for sorrowe, died, when he had raigned 38. yéeres, and was buried in the north Ile of Saint Paules Church in London. Io. Taxtor. W. Malmes. Alfredus Beuerl.

EDmond the son of Etheldred by his first wife, succéeded in the kingdome, who (whether it were for the great strength of his bodie, or for that hee alwaies vsed to go in armour) was surnamed Ironside. 1016

Canute in the meane time, with all his naute came vp to London, & on the south side the Thames, he caused a trench to be cast, through the which he caused all his ships to be towed or drawne into the west side of the bridge. And after with a déepe and large trench and siege they compassed the Citie round about, and so shut vp all going in or out, of all manner of persons: and after attempted to haue wonne it by assault, but that would not serue, the Citizens made so valiant resistance, that in the end, the enemies were repulsed farre from the wals: whereupon the siege for a time being dismissed, part of the army being left to kéepe the ships, the other part went into the West Saxonie, with such spæde, that they gaue no leisure vnto king Edmund to gather his armie, notwithstanding, with that small army which he had, he boldly met with them in Dorsetshire, and ioyning battel with them at Penham nære to Gillingham, he ouercame them, and put them to flight. A trench cast, and ships towed about the south end of London bridge. Gillingham forrest in Dorsetshire. Penham.

After this, king Edmund determining manfully to giue battell vnto Canute with a greater hoste then before, mette with his army at a place called Sherestane in Worcestershire, where he in the foreward fiercely fought, executing the office both of a hardie souldiour and valiant Captaine. But because Edrike of Straton, the otte named Traitor, and the beloued Almaricus, and Algarus the sonne of Meaninus, which ought to haue ayded him with the Southamptonshire men and Wiltshire men were of the Danes party, hee was sore wearied, but yet the first day of the battell, the fight was so extreame and bloudie, that both the armies were so wearied, they were not able longer to fight.

The next day the king had ouerthrowne the Danes, but for Edrike of Straton, who séeing the Englishmen haue the better hand, he cutte off the head of a certaine man, named Osmearus, like to king Edmund in face and haire, and holding it vp, cried out, that the Englishmen fought in vaine, and held vp the head, saying: Your master king Edmund is dead, flie as fast as you can: which the Englishmen had no sooner heard, but they were readie to flie. But shortly after vnderstanding the king to bee aliue, they tooke courage againe, and are carried vpon the Danes, and beate downe a great number of them. After this about midnight Canute commanded his people to depart with silence, and hasting toward London, went to their ships, and shortly after besieged London. Duke Edrike sued for pardon, and obtained it.

King Edmund hasted toward London, and deliuered the Londoners from the siege, chasing the Danes to their ships.

About two daies after, king Edmund passed ouer the Thames at Brentford, but passing the riuer manie of his men were drowned. He encreasing his armie, hasted toward the West Saxons. And the Danes againe go vp to London, but coulde there profite nothing: wherefore going from thence with their naule, they enter the riuer of Areine, and passe into Mercia, there to fetch spoiles, slaying all they mette, and burning Townes, and so laden with spoyle returne vnto their shippes. After this their footemen passe in shippes into the riuer of Medway, but their horsemen take prayes vpon the land.

King Edmunde againe passed the Riuer of Thames at Brentforde, entred Kent, and fought with the Danes at Otford, and put them to flight: and if the false Edrike had not staied him at Eaglesforde or Aelsforde, hee had that daie gotten the full victorie. To bee shorte, the first and last battell was at Aellenden in Esser, neere to Rochford, here he put his army into three battels.

In the meane time Cnute bringing his men into order, a sore battell was fought, and manie slaine on both sides. But Edrike perceiuing the Danes to giue ground, he with his power fledde, as he had promised to Cnute, and so king Edmund and the English armie had the worst: there was slaine in that battaile, Duke Alfrike, Duke Godwine, Vlfekettell Duke of East Angles, Athelwardus Duke, sonne to the Duke of East Angles, Athelwine called Gods friend, a duke: and almost all the companie of the English nobilitie. Cadnoth also bishop of Lincolne, sometimes Abbot of Ramsey, and Wolsey the Abbot, which were come together with their clergie to pray to God for the soulsiours that fought, were slaine. And Edmund went almost alone on foote to Glocester, where he gathered a newe force to set vpon his enemies, but Cnute pursued him as he fled. And hauing prepared their armies, both the kings themselues attempted to fight hand to hand for the right of the kingdome in the Ile of Olania in Seuerne, in the which combate, they both being wearied, fell to a couenant to deuide the same, so that the one halfe of the kingdome should be vnder Canutus, and the other halfe vnder Edmund, which Edmund not long after died at London, slaine by the treason of Edrike of Straton, and was buried at Glastenburie, leauing Edmund and Edward his children very young.

1018 The Danes possessed all England.

CAnutus the Dane, taking an occasion, because in the couenant that was concluded concerning the deuiding of the Realme, no assurance was made for the children of Edmund, he chalenged all England to himselfe alone by lawe as they call it, of growing to, which was a most easie thing for him to doe, because there was no man that durst erect himselfe as patrone to defende the childrens right and title, and by this subtile and craftie interpretation of the couenant the Dane got the Monarchie of England, and slewe the brother of Edmund, and conueied the children farre awaie out of England, least they shoulde at anie time be brought againe and receiue their right. Some say, they were sent to a certaine man that was a Prince in Swethland, there to be dispatched out of the waie: and that the Prince vnderstanding they were kings

And the other, which was the elder brother, whose name was Edmund, died without childzen.

Agatha the Emperours daughter the wife of Edward.

In the meane season Canutus, because he had no heyre that lawfully might succéede him in his kingdome (for Harolde and Swaine were begotten of a concubine) partlie that hée might establish in time to come the kingdome that he had gotten vnto his owne kindred that came by lawful succession; and partlie that he might purchase to himselfe the friendship of the Englishmen, and of the Normans, procured to haue giuen him in marriage Emma, the widow of king Etheldred, who at that time was with Edwarde and Alured her Sonnes in exile with Duke Richarde in Normandie, which marriage séemeth to bee made euen by Gods prouidence, who had determined to restore the common wealth in England, whereby, as by the Lawe and Title of Recouerie, and returne out of exile, the monarchie of all England, which the Danes had taken from the Englishmen, and had possessed sixe and twentie yeares and more, did returne agayne to the Englishmen that were the right heyres. For Emma concluded marriage with the Dane, vpon condition that the kingdome of England shoulde remaine vnto none other but vnto the childzen that were begotten of her, if anie of them did remaine aliue: by reason of this marriage, shortlie after she did beare Canutus a sonne of his owne name, commonly called Hardycanutus.

How 2. names were giuen to kings.

This second name was giuen him because of his great courage, like as his brother Harolde was named Harefote, that is to saie, Lightfote, because of his notable swiftnes of fote.

By this affinitie and aliance, the Danes became of the more strength and power. He kept the Englishmen in his seruice so long as he liued.

At the feast of Christmasse, king Canute being at London, commaunded the traytour Edrike of Straton to bee put to death in his Pallace closelie for feare of tumulte. Some saie, hee was tormented to death with firebrandes and linkes: some saie one waie, some another, but dispatched hee was: for the king feared, through his treason to be circumuented of his kingdome, as his predecessors had béene before, to wit, Ethelred and Edmund. His bodie hee caused to bee layde forth on the wall of the Citie, there to remaine vnburied, to bee séene of all men. With him also were slaine, Northman a Duke, son to duke Leofwinus brother to Leofricus, and Ethelwardus the son of duke Eglemore, and Brithricus sonne of Elfegus prince of Denonshire: these died without fault (sayeth mine Authour.) The king made Leofrike Duke in his brothers place, and he loe him afterwardes verie deare. King Canute subdued the Scots, whereby he was king of Englande, Scotlande, Denmarke, and Norway.

S. Edmundsburie newe founded and priuiledges graunted.

Canute founded anew the Monastery of Saint Edmund at Bury, restoring to the same, the donation which Edmund king of the West Saxons had giuen to Saint Edmund the king and Martyre, who was there buried: he displaced the secular Priestes for their dissolute life, and placed there an Abbot with Monks, he gaue to them many great liuelodes, and made a ditch ouerthwart Newmarket heath, it is nowe by some called, the Diuelles ditch, to enclose the lands sometime belonging to king Edmund, and discharged the same of all tribute.

King Edward the Confessor, since that time, not onely confirmed the saide liberties of S. Edmund, but also gaue to Abbot Baldwin a stampe, and authoritie to haue an exchange or minte, and to coine in his Monasterie: And more to encrease their franchise, gaue the manour of Mildenhall and ỳ towne, with eight hundreds to their possession (saith Iohn Lydgate) and true it is, that I find in record, the franchise of Saint Edmundsbury, to containe these hundreds following, Blackborne, Risebridge, Thedwardster, Babbar, Cosford, Thingo, Lackeford, and Erning halfe hundred. Thus much for the liberties of that Towne. Now Baldwine a Monke, of Saint Dionys, physition to the said king Edward, being made Abbot of Bury in the space of nine and twenty yeares, erected a newe Church of stone, by licence of William Conqueror, brought from Caine in Normandy, landed at Ratlisden, and from thence brought by land to Bury: the foundation was accomplished, and the bodie of the Martyre, was translated out of a chappell called Rotund, into a shrine prepared for him in the new Church of Bedriswoorth or Bury, in the yeare of our Lord God 1095. Thus much for Bury.

Henry Huntington.

Henry of Huntington of this Canute hath as followeth: Men (saieth hee) doe speake of the great deedes that hee did: first, that he married his daughter to the Emperour Conradus: that he went nobly to Rome, and came againe with pretious giftes: that he set his feete on the sea strond while the sea was flowing, and commanded the Sea not to rise, to wet his Lordes feete or clothes: but the Sea keeping his olde course, rose, and wet both his feete and his thighes: whereupon the king started away, and saide: All men shall weete and knowe, that the power and might of kings is vaine, and vanitie: and that

And after this, this Canutus neuer bare Crowne vpon his head, but hee set the same vpon the head of the Crucifix at Winchester. Peter Pictaui, once chancellor of Paris, saith, that the custome to hang vp the armour of kings and noblemen, and other in churches, sprang of that this Canutus refused to weare his crowne, and offered the same as is shewed. Edward and Alfred Sons to king Ethelred, with manie knights, came out of Normandy, to see their Mother at Winchester, which sore troubled the mindes of many great men, who bare more fauour to king Harold. Especially Godwyne Earle of Kent, fayning to receiue Alfred as a friend, came to meete him, but in the end put him in prison, part of his company he put in fetters, and after put out their eies. Of some hee caused their skinne to bee plucked ouer their eares, chopping off their hands and feete. Some he commaunded to bee sold, and diuers were murthered at Gilford.

Queene Emma hearing of this dealing, shee sent her sonne Edward backe againe into Normandy. 1040 McBeth K. of Scotland Tyrant & usurper.

After this, Alfride was conueied to the Ile of Ely, where his eies being first plucked out, hee was deliuered to the Monkes to be kept prisoner there, where shortlie after hee departed this life, and was buried in the south Ile of the west part of the Church. Because Hardicanutus delaied to come ouer being sent for, hee was vtterlie reiected, and Harold, who before was king of the Mercies and Northumbers, was chosen king of all England, who shortly after expelled his mother in lawe Emma out of the Realme. Hee raigned three yeres, died at Orford, and was buried at Westminster, and after at S. Clements without Templebar at London.

HArdycanutus the lawfull begotten Sonne of Canutus and Emma, as soone as hee had gotten his fathers kingdome, fetched home his mother out of exile: and in reuenge of displeasure that was done to her, and of the murther of his brother Alured, hee commanded the carcasse of Harold to bee digged out of the earth, and to be throwne into the Riuer of Thames, where by a fisher it was taken vp, and brought to the Danes, who buried it in a church yard, which they had at London. 1042 This is supposed to bee S. Clementes Church without Temple Barre.

With done, the king appointed eight markes to be paied to euerie sailer in his his name, and twelue markes to euery pilote or maister, which tribute was to be paid of all England, so grieuous, that scarce any was able to beare it.

Shortly after, he sent for Edward the sonne of Etheldred his brother on the mothers side, to come into England, and embraced him with al loue and fauor. Being at a mariage feast pleasantly drinking with the Bride and other persons, in the middest of his cups hee fell sodainly downe to the ground, and remaining dumbe, departed this life the third yeere of his raigne, and was buried by his father at Winchester.

Dane gilte.

This Edward for his excellent holinesse, is vntill this day called Saint Edward, who so soone as he had gotten his fathers kingdome, of his owne free will released the tribute of fourtie thousand poundes called Dane gilt, which the English people, euen from the verie beginning of the raigne of the Danes, was compelled to paie to their kings euerie yeere. He was also the chiefe author and cause, that the law which we call the common Law, was first brought vp, being gathered together out of the lawes and ordinances of foure nations, which were receiued when the Iland was subiect to diuers regiments and gouernances, to witte, of the Mercies, of the West Saxons, of the Danes, and of the Northumbers. He was hard to his mother, because she was hard to him in his minoritie, and also suspected with Alwine bishop of Winchester, whom he put in prison by counsell of Robert Archbishop of Canterburie: but after his mother had purged her selfe, Alwine was deliuered, and Robert the archbishop conueied himselfe out of England. He toke to wife Edgitha, the daughter of Earle Godwine, who was a Virgin most chaste, in whose breast there was a Schole of all liberall Sciences (saieth William of Malmesbury.) And for a further testimony of the said Queene, Ingulphus writeth thus: Vnto this Edward was giuen to wife, the daughter of Earle Godwine, a very beautiful Damosell, verie well instructed in learning: and for behauiour, and the rest of her life, a virgin most chast, & for humility most holy, named Edgitha, in no point sauouring of her father or brothers barbarousnes, but milde and modest, faithfull and honest, enemy, or hurtfull to no bodie: whereupon this verse was spoken of her:

The first comming vp of the common law Mercies, West Saxons, Danes, and Northumbers.

Ingulphus.

Sicut spina rosam, genuit Godwinus Editham.

I haue seene her (saieth Ingulphus) often, when being yet but a boie, I came to see my father, dwelling in the Kings Court. And often, comming from Schole, when I mette her, shee would appose mee touching my learning and lesson, and falling from Grammar to Logicke, wherein she had some knowledge, would subtilly conclude an argument with me, and by a hand maiden giue three or foure peeces of money, and send me vnto the place where I should receiue some victuals, and so be dismissed.

Now concerning this Edward, he was borne in England, as is afore shewed, but brought vp in Normandie, and continuing there a long time, was in a manner manner become French, bringing hither, and drawing out of Normandy verie manie, whom he promoted to diuers dignities, and exalted aboue measure. Among whome chiefely was one Robert a Monke of Gemitefence, made by him first Bishop of London, and after Archbishop of Canterbury. And William the kings Chaplaine made bishop of Worchester.

Then beganne the whole land vnder the king, and other Normans brought in, to leaue off the English rites, and in manie things to imitate the maners of the French. All the noble men tooke it to be a great point of gentrie in their courtes to speake the French tongue, to make their Charters and deedes after the manner of the French, and to bee ashamed of their owne custome and vse, as well in this, as in many other things. But hereof more in another place.

He sent for home into England his nephew Edward the sonne of king Edmund his brother, who by reason of his long absence out of the countrey, was commonly called the Outlawe. This is that Edward the sonne of king Edmund surnamed Ironside, which remained aliue, whome Canutus when hee had gotten England, had sent into Swethen with his brother. He knowing the aduise of his vncle, came againe into England, and brought with him Agatha his wife, and Edgar, Margaret, and Christian his children, borne in Pannonia, in hope of the kingdome, where hee lined but a while. Thus Saint Edward being disappointed, both of his nephew and his heire, for that Edward the Outlaw was both by nerenesse of bloud, and by lawfull succession right heire vnto the kingdome, without delaie pronounced Edgar the Outlawes sonne, and his great nephew, to be heire of the kingdome, and gaue him to surname Adeling, which name in those daies was peculiar onely to kings children, which were borne in hope and possibilitie of the kingdome: for this word Adeling, in the English tongue is as much to say, as Prince or Lord, the contrarie of which word is Vnderling, that is to say, a seruant or bondman: or, according to the Welsh speech, Adeling signifieth heire: but because this Edgar was but young of yeeres, and within age, by his testament he made Harolde the sonne of Godwine (a stoute man both in warre and peace) Regent, vntill the young Edgar should bee of age to receiue the kingdome, and that then hee should be made the king: which thing Harolde with a solemne othe promised to see so performed and done. Notwithstanding, he like a Traytour (by force of armes) immediately after the death of Edward, refused the name of Regent, and pronounced himselfe King, which thing shortly after brought destruction both to himselfe, and to all England.

In the yeare 1049. the Irish pirates with 36. ships entring into the mouth of Seuerne, arriued in a place called Willescaphan, and with the help of Griffith king of Southwales, spoiled about those coastes, and did much mischiefe. After this the saide Griffith, and those Irish pyrates ioyning their powers together passe ouer the riuer Wie, and brent Dumenham, and slew all that they there found. Against whome Aldredus bishop of Worcester, and other of Glocester and Herefordshires hastely went, but the Welshmen whome they had in their company, sent messengers to Griffith, willing him to make speed against the Englishmen, which hee did, and slewe many of them, and put the rest to flight.

This yeare king Edward and Edgitha his wife translated the bishops Sea from S. Germanes at Cridington, and placed the same at Excester: the king laying his right hand vpon the Altar of S. Peter, instituted one Leofrike bishop there, whom the king taking by the right hand, and the Queene by the left hand, stalled him in his bishops seate, in the presence of fiue dukes, and manie other noble men: al which king Iohn established, confirmed, and augmented by his Charter, the first yeare of his raigne.

England of the most grieuous tribute called Dane Gilt. It is reported that the kings clemencie was moued to compassion, vpon occasion as followeth. When his exactors (for so were they then called) or treasurers (as we cal them) had collected that grieuous tribute called Dane gilt, and brought it into the kings chamber, the king being called to see the heape of so great treasure, was at the first beholding thereof much afraid, protesting, that he did see a Diuell dancing vpon the heape of money, and making ouermuch ioy. And thereupon gaue cõmandement, it should be fourthwith rendered againe to the former owners thereof, & of so cruell an exaction, he would not keepe one farthing, but released the said tribute for euer. Eustace Earle of Bulloigne the elder, which had to wife Goda the sister of king Edward, arriued at Douer in Kent with a fewe ships, in the which Towne whilest his Souldiers rashly tooke vp their Innes, they slewe one of the townesmen, in reuenge whereof, not only the quarreller, but other of his company, with many of the Towne were slaine, which doing so much offended Godwine Earle of Kent, that hee assembled a great power out of all his Countries, of Kent, Sussex, and Westsex, and his eldest sonne Harold out of his Earldomes of Dreford, Glocester, Hereford, Somersetshire, and Barkshires; & his son Swaine out of Eastsex, East England, Huntington and Cambridgshires, so that he had a great armie, therwith he marched towards Glocester, where the king then lay, vnto whom he sent messengers to denounce warre, except he would deliuer Eustace, and his fellow Normans and Bolonians, which held a Castell vpon the Cliffe of Douer: but king Edward when he vnderstode that the armies of Leofrike Earle of Chester, Siward Duke of Northumberland, and Ranulph Earle of Hereford were comming to his aide, he answered stoutely, that hee would in no wise deliuer Eustace or the other demanded. But after this, Godwines armie entring into Glocester, it was there agreed, that at a date appointed, the king and Earle Godwine should méte at London: & thus departing for the time, the king increasing his army, led the same to London, and Godwine with his power came to Southwarke on the other side of the riuer Thamis into his own house, but there because his army by little & little slipped from him, he fled, and the king fourthwith pronounced him, with his fiue sonnes, to be banished, who straight waies with his wife, and two of his sonnes came to Thorney, where his Shippe being laden with gold, siluer, and precious things, he sailed toward Flanders: his other sonnes tooke ship at Bristow, and sayled into Ireland. King Edward did see the Diuell dance.

The king forsaketh his wife Quéene Edgitha for displeasure conceiued against her father duke Godwine, and sent her with one maiden vnto Wilton, in no honourable wise, where she was committed to the custody of the Abbesse, William of Malmesbury addeth, that her goods being taken from her to the vttermost farthing, she was sent to Wilton there to bee kept vnder the kings sister, least whilest all her parents were in sorrow for their Countrey, she alone should rest in ease: but a nameless author, that wrote a booke intituled Vita Edwardi, which he dedicated to the same Edgitha writeth thus: The king pretending this honest cause of diuorce, that in the Monasterie of Wilton, where she had bin brought vp, she should be, to quiet such troubles of the realme. Thus therefore with kingly honor, and princely company (yet sorrowfull) shee was brought to the bondes of the Monasterie of Wilton, where almost one whole yére in praiers and teares she expected the day of comfort. At this time the most noble Earle, or Duke of Normans, William, with a great traine came into England, to king Edward, whom the king honourably receiuing, receyuing, and for a while keeping him, caried him about to his Cities, and kinglie Castels, and with condigne humanity shewed, at length gaue him many giftes, and dismissed him to his owne, but of the succession of the Realme, hope as yet or mention betweene them was not made.

Griffith king of Wales wasted a great part of Herefordshire, against whom, the men of that country & Normans out of the castel, went: but Griffith obtayned the victory, slaying many of them, and toke a great pray.

In the next yeere, Harold and Leofwine, sonnes of Earle Godwine, returning out of Ireland, entred Seuerne, arriued with many Ships in Somersetand Dorsetshires, spoiled manie Townes in the Country, slew many people, and returned with pray, then they saile about Portesmouth, &c.

Earle Godwine landed in Kent, gathered a power, sayled to the Ile of Wight, wasting along the Sea coastes, till his sonnes Harold and Leofwine came with a Nauie, which being come together, they take their course vppe the Riuer of Thamis, came to Southwarke, and there staied for the tide, and then weied vp Anchor, and finding none that offered to resist them on the bridge, they sailed vp by the south side of the riuer, & his armie by land, placing it selfe vpon the banks side, made shew of a thicke and terrible battaile.

After this, the Nauie turned toward the North shore, as though it would haue compassed in the kings Nauie: but they that were with the king, and with Godwine, abhorred to fight against their owne kindred and countrymen, wherefore a peace was made, Godwine with his sons were restored to all their former honor, and the Normans were banished the land. Such as had giuen the K. euil counsel against the English, a few excepted, as Robert the deacon & his Son in law, Richard fitz Scroby, Alfride the kinges sewer, Anfridus surnamed Geeresset, and other whom the king before the residue loued, & had been faithfull to him and his people, these were permitted to remain in England. Rob. Archbyshop of Canterbury, Wil. Byshop of London, Wilso B. of Lincolne & other Normans with much ado passed the sea, but Wil. bishop of London, for his honest conuersation being shortly called back again is restored to his bishoppick. Osberne Penticoste, and his fellow Hugh yelded vp their Castelles, and by licence of Earle Leofricus went through his Earledome into Scotlande, and were receiued of Machuta king of Scots.

On the second day of Pasch, Earle Godwine as he sate at meat with the king, being suddenly stricken with a grieuous sickenes, he shranke down dumb in the seat where he sate, which his sonnes, Earle Harold, Tosti, & Girthe beholding, bare him into the kings chamber, hoping that he should haue recouered, but when his strength failed him, on Thursday following he died in miserable torment, and was buried in the olde Monasterie of Wincheſter, whose Dukedome his sonne Harold toke vpon him, and his Earledome is giuen to Algarus the sonne of Leofricus Earle of Chester, thus hath Florens of Wircester. Now to adde somewhat out of Vita Edwardi, Duke Godwine (saieth he) and his sonnes being reconciled to the king, and the Countrey being quiet, in the second yere after, died the said Duke of happie memorie, whose death was the sorrow of the people, him their father, him the nourisher of them and the kingdome, with continuall weeping they bewailed: he was buried with worthie honor in the old Monasterie of Wincheſter, giuing to the same Church giftes, ornaments and rentes of lands. Harold succeeded in his dukedome, which was a great comfort to the whole English nation, for in vertue both of bodie and minde he excelled all people, as an other Iudas Macchabeus, and was a friende to his Countrey, diligently supplying his fathers place, and walking in his steppes, that is to saie, in patience, mercie, and affabilitie to well willers, but to disquiet persons, theeues and robbers, with a lyons countenance he threatned his iuſt seueritie, thus much out of the auncient monument intituled Vita Edwardi.

Touching his issue (saieth William Malmesbury) Godwine in his first age had to wife the sister of Knute king of England, Denmarke, and Norway, of whome hee begate a sonne, which when he was past his childes age, whilest hee prowdly did ride vpon an horse, which the king his grandfather had giuen him, the horse bare him into the Riuer of Thamis, where he was drowned, his mother also was slaine with a thunderbolt. This king Edward of famous memory (saith mine Author) before the daie of his nativitie was elected of God, who persevering in chastitie, led all his life dedicated vnto God in true marriage, wherefore as we haue knowne proued by good and sufficient men being witnesses, God greatlie glorified him in his life with wonderfull signes, amongst the which, this that followeth was one.

King Edward healed a woman of a disease in her throate, since called the kings euill. Vita Edwardi. W. Malmes.

A yong woman married, but without children, had a disease about her iawes, and vnder her cheeke, like vnto kernels, which they termed akornes, and this disease so corrupted her face with stench, that shee coulde scarce without great shame speake to anie man, this woman was admonished in her sleepe, to goo king Edward, and get him to wash her face with water, and she should be whole. To the Court she came, and the king hearing of this matter, disdained not to do it, and hauing a bason of water brought vnto him, he dipped his hand therein, and washed the womans face, and touched the diseased place, and this he did oftentimes, sometimes also signing it with the signe of the Crosse, which after he had thus washed it, the hard crust or skinne was softened and dissolued, and drawing his hand by diuers of the holes, out of the kernels came little worms, whereof they were full, with corrupt matter and blood, the king still pressed it with his handes to bring forth the corruption, and disdained not to suffer the stench of the disease, vntill he had brought forth all the corruption with pressing, this done, he commanded her a sufficient allowance euery day for all things necessary, vntil she had receiued perfect health, which was within a weeke after,

Next after this, mine authors affirme, that a certaine man named Vlfunius Spilcorne, the sonne of Vlmore of Nutgarshall, who when he hewed timber in the Wood of Bruheullena, laying him downe to sléepe after his sore labour, the blood and humours of his head so congeled about his eyes, that hee was thereof blind, for the space of 19. yéeres, but then (as he had béene moued in his sléepe) hee went vvoluvarde, and bare voted to manie Churches, in euerie of them to pray to God for helpe in his blindnesse, and then last of all hee came to the Court, where a long time hee stood at the entrie of the kings Chamber, an earnest suitter, till at the length the king hearing of the blindmans dreame, hee said, by our Lady Saint Mary, I would doe much with a good will, if it vvoulde please God through me to haue mercie vpon the poore vvretch, and thus being driuen to it by his seruants, he laid his handes the water vpon the blind mans eies, and straightway the blood dropped plentifully from him, and being healed, he cried with a chéerefull voice, I sée thée, O king, I sée thee, O king. Thus hauing recouered his sight, he kept the kings Pallace at Windsore a long season (for there hee was healed) after king Edwarde was dead, and deceased in the raigne of William Conquerour.

Aluered. Riual.

Alluridus Riuallensis writing the life and death of this king, reporteth him to be a man void of pride, a louer of peace, a vanquisher of Ire, a contemner of couetousnes, &c. And for example he writeth, that as king Edward on a time lay waking in his bedde, it chanced that his Chamberlain or Steward, taking monie out of one of the kings coffers, left the same coffer open after him, and went his waies about the kings businesse, which thing being espied of a yong fellow that was wont to wait on the kings table to beare away empty vessell, he came to the coffer, thinking the king had béene a sléepe, and thrust a great quantitie of monie into his bosome, and going awaie laid it where he thought best, and comming againe did the like, but when he came the third time, and that the king knew (as was thought) that his Chamberlaine was at hand, and willing the théefe to be voyde of danger, Thou art importunate saide the king, if thou wilt beléeue me, take that thou hast, & get thee hence, for by Gods mother, if Hugelin come (for so was his Chamberlains name) he will not leaue thée one pennie, whereupon the yong fellow ran his way, and was neither vttered nor pursued by the king, and behold, when the Chamberlaine came, and perceiued much monie to be gone through his negligence, he was in such sorrow, that his sighes and other noise that he made bewraied him, whereupon the king rising, and séeming not to knowe the matter, asked what hee ailed to bee so troubled, which when the Chamberlaine had tolde what had happened, holde thy peace said the king, happily he that hath taken it hath more nede then we haue of it, let him haue it, that which remaineth is enough for vs.

The 24. day of Aprill, a Comet appeared, not onelie to the people of this land, but also in other parts of the world seauen daies. Tostus enuying (as men saide) the prosperitie of his brother, stirred vp troubles in the Realme, for hee ioining himselfe to Harold the king of Norway, assaulted England in warlike sort, both by Sea and Land. Whose attempt whiles Harolde of England prepared to withstand, William Duke of Normandie, who notwithstanding hee was a bastard, was of kinne to Saint Edward in the third and fourth degree of consanguinitie, seeing a conuenient time and occasion offered to take the kingdome in, gathered a nauy of 896. ships, and came into England with a verie well appointed armie, alledging, that by all right and title it was due to him, by the gift of king Edwarde his kinsman, and also by the couenant that was made, and by oth established betwixt Harold and him. Hee landed at Pemsey, neere vnto Hastings in Sussex, on the 28. daie of September, where in going out of the ship, the dukes foote slipped, but he recouered it well inough, and one of the souldiers that were next him, cried vnto him, & said, Oh Duke thou hast gotten England, and thou shalt be king: he fortified there a peece of ground, and intrenched it, leauing there a competent number of his men to keepe the same, went then to Hastings, where he built another fortresse, notwithstanding hee restrained all his host from rouing, and by the space of fiftéene daies, hee kept himselfe so quietly, that a man would haue thought he had meant nothing lesse then to haue warre.

William duke of Normandie arriued at Pemsey in Sussex. Castels of Pemsey, and Hastings builded.

Harold, notwithstanding he was bare of men by reason of the battel that he had fought against Tostus and the menne of Norway, yet hearing of Williams comming euen so bloody as he was in his armour he went towards Hastings, being garded with a very small company of souldiors, his fatal destinies so driuing him forward headlong. Notwithstanding hee sent out before, them that should spy and view the number and force of the enimies, which when they were perceiued to be among the Dukes tents, Duke William caused them to be led about the tents, and then made them good cheere, commanding them to be sent home to their Lord safe without harme. When they were returned againe, Harold asked them what tidings they brought, and they with long commendation extolled the clemencie of the Duke, and in good sadnesse declared that all the host almost did seeme to be priests, because they had all their face & both their lippes shauen. For the Englishmen did leaue their vpper lips vnshauen, with the haire growing alwaies, which thing also Iulius Cæsar in his commentaries declareth to be an heathen fashion of the old Brytaines.

Girthe brother to Harold.

The king laughing at their follie, saide, they be no Priests but men of warre, valiant in armes and stoute in courage, Girthe his brother tooke the worde out of his mouth, and saide, forasmuch as the Normans be of such great force, me thinketh it were not wisely done of you to ioine battel with them, you cannot denie but that with or against your will, you made vnto him an othe, therefore you shoulde do more wiselie, if you kéepe you out of this present necessitie and strait, and do but onely ieopard vs, and let vs abide the daunger to make a shew of battaile, wée which neuer sware to him maie iustlie draw our weapons in defence of our Country, you may iustly assist, and restore vs if we flie, and you maie auenge our death, if wée be slaine. But such was the hardinesse of Harolde, that he woulde giue no god eare vnto his counsaile, because he thought it shame and reproch to turne his backe vnto any danger whatsoeuer, and with the same vndiscretenes, he draue away a monke that was duke Williams Ambassador, onely he wished that God would be iudge betwixt duke William and him.

The Monke brought 3. offers, to wit, that either Harolde shoulde vpon certaine conditions giue ouer the kingdome, or to be king vnder duke Wil. or else ỹ in the sight of both the armies, they two should try ye matter with the sword betwixt them, for Duke William chalenged the kingdome (as hée sayde) because king Edward by the counsaile of Stigand Archbyshoppe of Canterburie, of Earle Godwine, and Earle Swardus, had giuen it vnto him, (a thing vnlike to bee true) if Harold would denie this, hee offered to stande to the iudgement of the sea Apostolike. Offers made by Duke W. to K. Harold. challenge of Duke William Siward.

Of which message, the Ambassadour had none other answere giuen then I told you, whereupon he departed, and incouraged the harts of his countrymen to battaile.

Then the stoute Captaines on both sides set in order their battailes, according to the fashion of their Countries. The Englishmen (as was reported) then they had spent the whole night in drinking, singing and dauncing, not sléping one winke, in the morning, without delay fell vpon their enimies, all the footemen with their poleares being intrenched with their targets before them, made a ranke that nothing coulde enter vpon them, which thing without doubt should haue béene for their safegarde, if the Normans had not fained as though they would haue fled, and by that meanes caused them to breake the arraie wherein they had set themselues. The king himselfe stode a foote by the Standard, and his brethren Girthe and Leofwine with him, to the ende that in such a common perill and ieopardy, no man should once thinke to flie or run away. Duke William after he had got the victory, sent this standert to the Pope, which was made after the shape & fashion of a man fighting, wrought by sumptuous art with gold & pretious stones: on ỹ other side the Normans gaue themselues to acknowledging their sins, and to prayer al the night, & in the morning they communicated the lords body. The footmen with their bowes & arrowes defended the first front, & the horsemen were set in the rereward deuided into two wings. D. William then with a loud voyce, declaring vnto them that God would be with them, because his quarrell was iust and good, called for his armor immediatly, and through the tumult and hastie running of his seruants, he put his coat of fence on the wrong way, to wit, the inner side outward, at which English men more giuen to drinking then to prayer. Standert of king Harold.

chance he laughed, and turning the right side outwards, said the prowes of my dukedome shall bee turned into a kingdome. Then they beganne to sing the songs of Rowland, to the intent that the example of that man of armes should inflame them that should fight, then after they had called to God for aide, they beganne the battell, fought fiercelie, neither of both parts giuing place till the daie was farre spent, which thing when duke William did perceyue, hee gaue his men counsaile to make as though they would fly, & to withdraw themselues out of the fielde, by which deuice the ranke of the Englishmen was broken, and whiles they meant to smite their enimies on the backes, the Normans turned themselues in good order, and set vpon the Englishmen, being dispersed and out of array, and so put them to flight. Thus the Englishmen died a faire death in defence of their country, and yet they were not slacke in reuenging of themselues, for they stood hard to it, and made great slaughter of them that pursued them, for hauing gotten a hill, they ouerthrew the Normans into the valley, as they couragiously did clime to attaine the said hill, and with their dartes which they shot, and stones which they cast vpon the Normans, that were vnder them, with small labour beat them al into the bottome. Also the Englishmen with a speedy, and to them wel knowne passage, running through a certaine ditch, did ouerthrow so many of their enimies following them, that with the dead bodies, they made they valley euen with the higher ground, thus it continued all that whole daie, that one while the English, another while the enimies had the better, so long as Harold was aliue, but in the closing of the euening, when he by the shot of an arrowe (which pierced his braine) was killed, the Englishmen fled awaie in the night season: one of the souldiors when Harold was slaine, did cut him in the legge with a sword, for the which deede duke William blaming him for his cowardlinesse and shamefull act, put him out of the wars. Also duke William whilest he shewed his fiercenes in euerie place, three of his best horses were slaine vnder him that day, the power of God so defending him that the enimie did drawe no blood of his bodie, notwithstanding the number of dartes throwne at him. The two brethren of king Harold, to wit, Gerthe & Leofwine were there slaine, with almost all the Nobles of England, and the Normans had the victorie, especially (saith Rowse) by meanes of their wodden bowes and arrowes (which the Englishmen had not then in vse) for Duke William commanded his men that some of them should shote directlie forwarde, and other some vpward, by reason whereof, the arrowes shot vpward, destroied the Englishmen as they stooped, and the arrowes shot directly aforehand wounded them that stood vpright. And king Harold himselfe (valiantly fighting) as also is said, was shot through the braines, whereof hee died, when he had raigned nine monethes and odde daies. This battell was fought nine miles from Hastings in Southsex vpon the 14. day of October being Saturday, in the yeare of Christ 1066. There was slaine of Englishmen 67974. saith I. le Tailour in his historie of Normandy, or 47944. after other. And of the Normans 6013 besides such as were drowned.

ming, with barbarous countenance and gesture, in warlike sort, prouoked all men to malice and hatred towardes them, who ouercame all men by warre and subtiltie: but after they had receyued the Christian fayth, and by little and little applyed their diligence vnto Religion, they neglected the exercise of armour, for the kings did change their habite, and some at Rome, and some in their owne Countrie, sought to change their temporall kingdomes for euerlasting kingdomes: and many which al their liues time embraced worldly things, did yet distribute their treasures vnto all the works of mercy: but afterwards when charitie waxed colde, all their studie and trauaile in religion slacked, and then came the destruction of the inhabitantes: first at the comming of the Danes, and now in the expulsing of the Englishmen by the Normans: for the noble men giuing themselues to gluttonie and lecherie, did not goe to the Church in the morning, as Christian men vse to doe, but lying in their Chamber dallying with women, did heare the Priest hastily rattel vp diuine seruice. The Clerkes also that had taken orders, if one had learned but his Grammar, euerie one wondred at him, the Monkes made a mocke of their rule, and were both finelie apparelled, & meetelie well fed. The common people were brought to bee a praie to the mightier sort, so that either their goods were souked from them, or else what was worse, their bodies were sent into farre Countries, to encrease the riches of the great men that oppressed them, many when they had fulfilled their lust, and had got their maides with child, they sent them out to bee common harlots, all men in generall gaue themselues to drinking and gulling, and in that kind of exercise they continued sometimes night & day. These vices made the Englishmen effeminate, & womanish, wherof it came to passe, that running headlong against Duke William, they lost themselues and their country, with one, and that an easie and light battaile.

The description of the Saxons. Mathew Paris. W. Malmes. Flores Historiar.

Marianus Scotus (a Scot) Author of an History from ye Birth of Christ to 1083 flor. in the Abbey of Fulda in Germany abt this time.

To conclude, the Englishmen were then apparelled in garments to the mid knee, their haire rounded, and their beards shauen, all saue the vpper lip, their armes adorned with golden bracelets, and their skin marked, painted, and printed, at meat they forced themselues to surfet, and dranke til they vomited, these last qualities they dealed to them that ouercame them, but I would not (saieth mine author) you should thinke I speake these euilles of all Englishmen, for I know that many of the Cleargie, did simply obserue the path of holinesse, and also of the lay people that did endeuour to serue God, &c.

Apparell of the English.

When Duke William had gotten the full victory, hee caused his men that were slaine to be buried, and also gaue leaue that if any man would they might burie their enimies in like manner, he gaue the body of Harold vnto Haroldes mother, at her request, taking no mony, although by messengers shee offered much, thus shee receiuing his bodie, buried the same at Waltham in Essex, in a Colledge which hee himselfe had founded to the honour of God and Saint Crosse, and had placed there a Deane and xi. Canons.

The death of Harold beeing knowne, Edwine and Morcare, two brethren of great towardnes, Earles, the one of Mercia, the other of Northumberlande, which with their people had withdrawen themselues from the battayle, came now to London, and sending the Queene Edgitha, the late kinges sister vnto the city of Chester, they solicited the citizens to erect either of them to the kingdome, which enterprise of theirs being frustrated, they departed into Northumberland, supposing that Duke William would neuer haue come thither. The rest of the nobles with the Citizens of London woulde haue erected Edgar the nephew of Edmond Ironside to the kingdome, and promised with him to giue a new battaile to Duke William, but through the daunger that was at hand, and the discorde that was among themselues, they did neyther. So that the Englishmen if they had agreed together, might haue reformed the decay of their Countrey, but whilest they would haue none of their owne Countreymen to be king, they brought in a stranger. In this meane time Duke William determining to passe to London, turned sooth of the right waie, ouer the West coastes of England, wasting and destroying through Sussex, Kent, Surrey, Hampshire, & Barkeshire, till he came to Warringford, or Wallingford, from thence he passed ouer the Riuer of Thamis, commanding his army to settle themselues there for a while, from thence he passed through Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire, and Hertfordshire, not ceasing to burne townes, and to slaie the people, till he came to Bercham, or Berkehamstede, where staying for a time, (for cause as shal be shewed) thither came to him Aldred Archbyshop of Yorke, Wolstane Byshoppe of Worcester, Wilfire Byshop of Hereford, Cito Edgare, and all other the noble men about London, with many other, who altogether submitted themselues giuing pledges, and sware fealtie vnto him, with whome also he made a league, but not withstanding he permitted his men still to burne Townes, and to take spoyles.

W. Gemiticen.

Lib. 5. Albani. Abbot of Saint Albons his policie against duke William.

The cause that Duke William staied at Berkehamstede, was this, there was at that time an Abbot of Saint Albones named Frederike, who when he heard of duke William his comming into Hertfordshire, hee caused the woods belonging to his Church round about Saint Albones, and so in the waies towardes London to be felled, so that no man could passe that way for the trées that were layde crosse one ouer an other, and thus this Abbot for the time, kept his Monasterie from spoiling, for duke William coulde not come there, but was forced to coast about, to the Castell of Berkhamstede (as is afore sayd) whither vnder suretie he sent for Fretherike the Abbot, and demanded of him, why such felling of woods was made about him more then in other places: whereunto Fretherike answered, and said, I haue done but as becommeth me, for if the Spirituall persons throughout this land had done their endeuour against thee as they mought and ought to haue done, it shoulde not haue béene in thy power to haue entred the land so farre: quoth duke William, is the spiritualtie of England of such power? If I may liue and enioy that which I haue gotten, I will make their power lesse, and especially I mind to begin with thee. The Abbot perceiuing hee had saide too farre, as soone as hée coulde departed home to his monastery, where calling a chapter of his brethren, he told them of duke William, what he had said, and then taking his leaue of them, departed and went to the Isle of Ely, from whence he neuer returned to his Abbey.

When Christmasse approched, Duke William marched with all his armie towardes London, whose scoutes comming together before him, to see the manner manner and behauiour of the people, found them assembled in the stretes, determined to resist Duke William with all their might; but when the Duke came thither, he made a great slaughter of the Citizens, till perceiuing themselues not able to resist him, they submitted themselues, and gaue pledges vnto him.

And thus ended the raigne of the Saxons, who were first sent for by Vortiger king of the Brytaines, as is aforesaid, about the yeare of our Lord 450. and had continued sometimes in wars with the Brytaines, then with the Danes, and now with the Normans the space of 600. yeares.

Verses of the Blazing Starre, which appeared on the 24. of Aprill last before passed, as is shewed.

A thousand fixe and sixtie yeere, it was, as we doe read, when that a Comet did appeare, and Englishmen lay dead.
Of Normady Duke William then, to England ward did saile, who conquered Harold with his men, and brought this land to baile.

¶ King William the Conquerour.

WIlliam Duke of Normandy, surnamed Conquerour, Bastard sonne of Robert the first, Duke of that Duchie, and cousin germane vnto King Edward on the mothers side, hauing slaine King Harold, and obtained the victory in the battaile neere vnto Hastings in Sussex, on the 14. day of October being Saterdate, in the yeare of our Lorde 1066. And also now hauing obtained the Citie of London (as is afore shewed) was there both by the Normans and English men chosen and proclaymed king on Christmasse day, which that yeare fel on the Munday, and forthwith the same day crowned, not by Stigand Archbishop of Canterburie and Primate of all England, who refused (as some saide) to crowne K. William, for that by bloud and crueltie hee had obtained the kingdome; but other affirme, that William would not take the crowne at his hands, because hee was chalenged of Pope Alexander, not to haue receiued the Pall Canonically, Robert a Norman, some time from London by king Edward translated to be Archbishop of Canterburie, as then liuing: wherefore Aelred Archbishop of Yorke, associating vnto him Wulfston Bysshop of Worcester, and Walter Bysshop of Hereford, with others of the nobilitie of England, annointed and crowned him king at Westminster: but before he was consecrated the Archbishop required an othe, which which he toke on the Altar of S. Peter, where he promised before the Clergie, and all the people, to defend the holy church of God, the Pastors thereof, and all the people subiect vnto him, he should iustlie gouerne: he should ordaine good lawes, and obserue true iustice, and to the vttermost of his power to withstand all rapines, and false iudgements.

Normans beards alwaies shaven.

This William was of a good stature, prowde of Porte, verie comelie, and bigge bodied, with a cruell countenance, and a balde forhead, his beard alwaies shaven, for so was the custome of the Normans, hee had great strength in his armes, so that manie did wonder at him, because no man coulde drawe his bowe, which hee would bende sitting on his horse backe, stretching out the string with his foote. Hee made great and costlie feasts vpon high and principall daies, keeping his Christmas offering at Gloucester, his Easter offering at Winchester, and his Whitson offering at Westminster, in eche place being crowned, and this he vsed euerie yeere so long as he continued in England. He called all his nobles of what estate soeuer they were to come to those feasts, to the ende that the Embassadours of forreine countries might wonder at the sight of such a multitude of people and preparation of delicate, and daintie fare, and hee was at no time more courteous, or readie to grant pardon to anie that had offended, then at such times, onelie couetousnesse of money was the thing, whereof he mought worthily be blamed.

Thomas Spot. Wil. Thorne.

King William toke his iourney towardes the Castle of Douer, to subdue that, and the countie of Kent: which when the Archbishop Stigand, and Egelsine the Abbot of Saint Augustines (being as it were the chiefest Lordes and gouernours of all Kent) did perceiue and consider, that the whole Realme was in an euill state, and that whereas in this Realme of England, before the comming of the foresaide Duke William there were no bondmen, now all, as well noble men, as the common people, were without respect made subiect vnto the perpetuall bondage of the Normans, taking an occasion by the perill and danger that their neighbours were in, to prouide for the safegard of themselues and their Countrey, they caused to assemble at Canterburie all the people of the Countie of Kent, and declared to them the perils and daungers imminent, the miserie that their neighbours were come into, the pride and insolencie of the Normans, and the hardnesse and griefe of bondage and seruile state: whereupon all the people rather choosing to ende their infortunate life, then to submit themselues to an vnaccustomed yoke of seruitude and bondage, with a common consent determined to mete duke William, and to fight with him for the lawes of their Countrey. And the foresaide Stigand, the Archbyshoppe, and the Abbot Egelsin, choosing rather to die in battaile, then to see their nation in so euill an estate, being incouraged by the examples of the holy Macchabees, became Captaines of the armie. And at a daie appointed all the people met at Swanescombe, two miles west from Graues-ende, and being hidden in the woods, lay priuilie in waite for the comming of the foresaid Duke William. And because it can not hurt to be verie wary in such cases, they agreed before hande, that when the Duke was come, and the passages on euerie side stopped, to the end he should no waie be able to escape, euerie one of them, as well horsemen as footemen, should beare boughes in their handes. The next daie after, when the duke was come into the fields & territories neere vnto Swanescombe, and sawe all the Countrey set and placed round about him, as it had beene a stirring and mouing wood, and that with a meane pace they approched and drewe neere vnto him, with great discomfiture of minde hee wondered at that sight. And assone as the Captaines of the Kentishmen sawe that Duke William was inclosed in the middest of their armie, they caused the Trumpets to be sounded, their banners to bee displaied, and threwe downe their boughes, and with their bowes bent, their swordes drawne, and their speares and other kinde of weapons stretched forth, they shewed themselues readie to fight: Duke William and they that were with him, (I wode (as no marualle it was) sore astonied, and amazed, and hee which thought that he had already al England fast in his fist, did now dispaire of his own life. Therfore on the behalfe of the Kentishmen were sent vnto Duke William, the Archbishop Stigand, and Egelsin Abbot of Saint Augustines, who tolde him their message in this sort.

My Lorde Duke, beholde the people of Kent commeth forth to meete you, and to receiue you as their liege Lord, requiring at your handes the thinges which pertaine to peace, & that vnder this condition, that all the people of Kent may enioy for euer their ancient liberties, and may for euermore vse the lawes and customes of their Countrey, otherwise they are readie presently to bidde battaile to you, and them that be with you, and are minded rather to die here altogether, then to depart from the lawes and customes of their Countrey, and to submit themselues vnto bondage, whereof as yet they neuer had experience. The Duke seeing himselfe to be driuen into such a straite and narrow pinch, consulted a while with them that came with him, prudently considering, that if he should take any repulse or displeasure at the handes of this people, which be the key of England, all that euer hee had done before, should be vndone againe, and of no effect, and all his hope and safetie shoulde stande in daunger and leopardie: not so willingly as wisely hee graunted the people of Kent their request. So when the couenant was established, and pledges giuen on both sides, the Kentishmen being ioyful, conducted the Normans (who also were glad) vnto Rochester, and yelded vp to the Duke, the Earledome of Kent, and the noble Castle of Douer. Thus the auncient liberties of England, and the lawes and customes of the Countrey, which before the comming of Duke William out of Normandy, were equallie kept throughout all England, doe (through this industrie and earnest trauell of the Archbishoppe Stigand and Egelsin Abbot of Saint Augustines) remaine inuiolably obserued vntill this day, onely in the County of Kent. Thus farre Thomas Spot, after him William Thorne.

The ancient liberties and lawes of England, remaine in Kent only.

King William brought the Iewes from Rhoane to inhabite here: he receiued homage, oth of fidelitie, and pledges of the nobles, and commanded that in euerie towne and village a bell should be rong euerie night at eight of the clocke, and that all people should then put forth their fire and candle, and goe to bedde, Iewes brought into England.

Fire and light forbidden to the Englishmen.

which order was obserued through this Realme during his raigne, and the raigne of William his sonne. Thus were the English men forced to imitate the Normans in habite of apparell, shaving off of their beardes, service at the table, and in all other outward gestures.

The Historiographers of that time accompted the yeare to begin at Christmas, after which accompt then beganne the yeare 1067. but after the accompt of England nowe obserued, the yeare beginneth not till the twentie fiue of March following.

And now because those houses maie not be vnremembred vnto whom king W. disposed the landes and possessions of this Realme for their good seruice, I haue thought good to publish the names of them as heretofore I haue done, out of the Chronicles of Normandy, gathered by William Tayleur of Rhoane.

To wit, Odo Bythoppe of Baion: Robert Earle of Mortaigne: These two were brethren to Duke William by his mother: Bandonni de Buillon: Roger Earle of Beamont, that was surnamed with the Beard, of him came the linage of Mellent.

This yeere through the great ſute and labour of William the Norman, then biſhop of London, king William granted the charter and liberties to the ſame

William

Wherefore the Mayor and Citizens of London repaire to Paules.

William Bishop, and Godfrey Portgreue and all the bourgies of the Citie of London, in as large forme as they enioyed the same, in the time of S. Edward before the conquest: in reward whereof, the Citizens haue fixed on his graue, being in the middest of the great West Ile of S. Paules church in London, this Epitaph following:

Epitaph of William bishop of London.

Gvilielmo viro sapientia & vitæ sanctitate claro, qui primùm diuo Edwardo regi & confessori familiaris, nuper in episcopum Londinensem erectus, nec multò post apud inuictissimum principem Guilielmum Angliæ regem eius nominis primum, ob prudentiam fidémque singularem in consilium adhibitus, amplissima huic vrbi celeberrima priuilegia ab eodem impetrauit: Senatus populúsque Londinensis bene merenti posuit. Sedit Episcopus Annos 20. Decessit anno à Christo nato 1070.

Hæc tibi, clare pater, posuerunt marmora cines,
Præmia non meritis æquiparanda tuis:
Namque sibi populus, te Londoniensis amicum,
Sensit, & huic vrbi non leue præsidium.
Reddita libertas duce te, donataque multis,
Te duce, res fuerat publica muneribus.
Diuitias, genus, & formam breuis opprimat hora,
Hæc tua sed pietas, & benefacta manent.

The same in English.

TO William a man famous in wisedome and holines of life, who first with S. Edward the king and Confessour being familiar, of late preferred to be bishop of London, and not long after for his prudencie and sincere fidelitie, admitted to be of counsell with the most victorious Prince William king of England, of that name the first, who obtained of the same great and large priuiledges to this famous citie: The Senate and citizens of London to him deseruing well deserued, haue made this. He continued Bishop twenty yéeres, and died in the yéere after Christ his natiuitie 1070.

These Marble monuments to thee thy Citizens assigne, Rewardes (O Father) farre vnfit to those deserts of thine.
Thee vnto them a faithfull friend, thy London people found,
And to this towne, of no small weight, a stay both sure and sound:
Their liberties restorde to them, by meanes of thee haue beene,
Their publike weale by meanes of thee, large gifts haue felt and seene.
Thy riches, stocke, and beauty braue, one houre hath them suppresst, Yet these thy vertues and good deedes, with vs for euer rest.

King William (leauing his brother Odo bysshoppe of Bayon, and William Fitz Osberne whome he had made Earle of Hereford, to be wardens of England) returned into Normandie, which at that time was bent to shrinke from him. He toke with him, Edgar Etheling, Stigandus archbishop of Canterburie, Frederike Abbot of S. Albons, Egelnothus Abbot of Glastenburie, Edwine Duke of Mercia, Morcarus duke of Northumberland, Walden Earle of Hamp-hampton and Huntington, Roger late Earle of Hertford, Renulph Earle of Cambridge, Gospatrike Earle of Cumberland, Gualter the son of Siward, and many other nobles of England, thinking they would be truer to him in a forreine countrey then in their owne: by their diligence he subdued the rebelling Normans.

When winter was at hand, king William returned, and set an importable tribute on the English men.

William Conquerour gaue to Geffrey Magnauile the Earledome of Eller, to the which Earledome, of auncient right belonged bearing of the kings standart, saith the Chronicle of Waltham.

After this, going into Deuonshire, he besieged Exceter, which the Citizens and other Englishmen held against him. The Countesse Githa mother of king Harold, and sister to Swanus king of Denmarke with many other fleeing out of the Citie escaped, and got them ouer into Flaunders, and the Citizens yeelded to the king. Exceter besieged.

Mathild wife to king William came forth of Normandie, and on Whitsonday, was consecrated Quéene by Aldred Archbishop of Yorke. Marleswine, Gospatrike, and other noble men of Northumberland, to auoyde king Williams rough and boisterous dealing, and fearing to bee put in warde, taking with them Edgar Etheling, with his mother Agatha, and his two sisters, Margaret and Christian, went by sea into Scotland, where they were receiued, and well entertained of Malcolme king of Scots, who toke Margaret the sister of Edgar to wife. King William with an army went to Nottingham, and there builded a Castell. He also went to Yorke, and there caused two Castles to bee builded, and put in them garrisons: he commanded also Castles to be made at Lincolne, and in other places. Whiles these things were in doing, Godwine and Edmund surnamed the Great, sons to king Harolde, returning forth of Ireland, landed in Sommersetshire, where Ednothus that was master of the horse to king Harolde, mette them with a great army, and fighting with them was slaine amongst many other. The two brethren hauing got the victorie, toke manie great praies in Cornewall and Deuonshire, and returned into Ireland. Anno reg. 2. 1068 Ypodigma. The king of Scots married Margaret sister to Edgar. Castles at Nottingham and Yorke builded.

It was the practise of king William to put the Englishmen into all places of danger, by that means to weaken their force: for against certaine English men that after the battel at Hastings fled into Denmark & Ireland, and came againe the third yere after with a great power, he set an English captain with an hoste of Englishmen, so both the armies fought, and brought the victorie to the king: the strangers were chased into Ireland, but with great slaughter of themselues, and losse of their captaine Ednothus, a man excellent in the time of the English men, both at home in his own countrey, and also abroad. He was the father of Harding, who liued in the time of king Henry the second. Thus when the power of the lay people was ouerthrowen, he also established, that no clarke of the English nation should be suffered to come to any promotion. He abhorred much the gentlenesse of Knouth which sometime had béene king of England, for that he restored them, whome he had ouercome, vnto all their Harding the sonne of Ednothus.

promotions and honours: whereby it came to passe, that when hee was dead, the inhabitants did easily expulse the strangers, and chalenge their olde right, and title.

Ingulphus. But king William deposing them, distributed the Earledomes, Baronies, Bishoprikes and dignities to his Normans: onely Hereward aforementioned in the yeere of our Lord 1062. had reward with a prosperous end. For being in Flanders, and hearing, that the realme was subdued by strangers, and that his fathers inheritance (his father Leofrike being dead) was given to a Norman, and that his mother a widow was much troubled and injuried, commeth with speede into England with his wife Thurfride, and gathering together a companie of his kinred, chased them out of his fathers inheritance. Then goeth to his uncle by the fathers side, then Abbot of Peterborowe, and first making confession of his sinnes, and absolution received, watcheth all night in the Church, in prayers and fasting, and the next daie offered his swoorde upon the Altar: and after the Gospell, the Abbot put the same hallowed swoorde about Herewardes necke, with a benediction, and communicating the holy mysteries of Christ, from thenceforth remained a lawfull knight.

Hereward made knight.

This custome of consecration of a souldiour, the Normans abhorred: and not onely this custome, but manie other they did alter and change: for the English men making deedes and charters, which to the time of king Edward had beene firme, by the subscriptions of the faithfull with Crosses of Gold, and other holie seales, the Normans did condemne those charters and deedes, and appointed them to make their charters and deedes firme, with a print set upon ware by the speciall Seale of everie one, under three or foure twinelles.

Ancient deedes.

At the first, manie farmes and manors were given by bare woordes without writing: onely with the swoord of the Lord, or his headpeece, with a horne, a standing goblet: and manie tenements, with a quill, with a horse combe, a bowe, or arrowe, to writ in the beginning of his raigne: but in the yeeres after this manner was changed. They did so much abhorre the very speech, that the lawes of the land were pleaded in the French tongue. And boies in Schooles were taught their letters, and principles in Grammar in French, and not in English, &c.

Among the lawes of William Conquerour, there is one of the Churches as followeth. If any man breake the peace of the Church violently, he is in the jurisdiction of the bishops to have iustice, but if the partie that is guiltie, flie from it, or arrogantly refuse the Bishops order, the king within fortie daies shall be enformed of it, who will presently take suretie of him, that he shall satisfie God first, and then the king: but if within thirtie daies hee can not be found, the king by the woordes of his owne mouth shall outlawe him, and if after he be found, and maie be kept, he shall bee deliuered to the king alive, or els his head if hee defend himselfe, for hee beareth the head of a Wolfe, after the daie of his outlawrie, this is the generall law concerning outlawes.

This yeare Henrie the kings sonne was borne in England: his other sons, Robert, William and Richard were borne beyond the seas in Normandy, before he conquered England. Ameroy.3. Henry the first borne.

King William gaue to Robert surnamed Cumin, the Earledome of Northumberland, of whose comming thither, when the men of that country heard, they made themselues ready to forsake their houses, and to shift for themselues abroad: but sodainly there fell such abundance of snow, and roughnes of weather, that they could not in any wise flie, wherefore they toke a deuice and concluded, either to flie the realme, or else to die all together for the libertie of the country. The which thing when the Bishop of Durham vnderstode, hee went out to meet the earle, and exhorted him to turne backe againe: but he suffering his souldiers to robbe and spoile, would not heare ante counsell of health, but forthwith entred Durham with seuen hundred men, spoiling like enemies through the house of Durham euery where what they liked for the time, which lasted not long, for on the next morning early the men of Northumberland being gathered together, burst open the gates, and running vp and downe, slate all that they found in that Citie, that toke part with the Earle, whereby al the stretes were filled with bloud and dead bodies: some there were that defended the entrie of the house, wherein the Earle was, and had thought to haue saued himselfe, but the other by fire endeuoured to burne the house, with al that were therein, whereby the west tower of the church was burnt, but through the wind that then blewe out of the East, the church escaped burning: notwithstanding the house yet burning as it began, some of them that were within were burnt and other some, whilest they burst out to saue themselues, were immediately slaine, so that the Earle himselfe was dispatched, and all his souldiours saving one that hardly escaped being wounded. King William taking great displeasure with these doings of the Northumbers, directed a certaine Duke with an army, to reuenge the slaughter of Earle Robert: but when they were come to Alnerton, and was in the next morning setting forward towardes Durham, there arose such a darkenesse of weather through thicknesse of clouds, that they could vneth see one another, so that they could not find their waie, whereupon they returned, and so it came to passe, God hauing pitie vpon them, that they heard of the departure of their enemies before they heard of their comming towards them. 1069 Lib. Dunelm.

About the same time, by the testimonie of an old Chronicle in the Librarie at Richmont, king William gaue such a gift of lands as followeth: Lib. Richmond.

I William king, the third yeere of my raigne, Giue to the Norman Hunter, to me that art both life and deere,
The Hop and the Hopton, and all the boundes vp and downe, Vnder the earth to hell, aboue the earth to heauen,
From me, and from mine, to thee, and to thine,
As good, and as faire, as euer they mine were:
To witnes that this is sooth, I bite the white waxe with my tooth,
Before Iugge, Mawde and Margery, and my youngest sonne Henry,
For one bow and broad arrow, when I come to hunt vppon Yarrow.

The Danes inuade England.

Somewhat before the feast of the nativitie of our blessed Ladie, Harold and Canutus sonnes to Swanus king of Denmarke, Earle Esborne, Earle Turkellus, Christerne their bishop, and many other, with 204. ships comming from Denmarke, landed in the mouth of the riuer Humber, where Clito Edgar, earle Waltheus, and Merleswine, with many other, and the naute which they had assembled came to them, of whose comming Aldred Archbishop of Yorke being verie sorrowfull, made earnest intercession to almighty God, that he mought not see the vtter ruine and destruction of his countrey, fell sicke, and ended his life in the yéere next following, as shall be shewed.

The eight day after the landing of the Danes, to wit, on the nineteenth day of September, the Normans that kept the Castle of Yorke, fearing least the houses that were nere to the Castle should be a furtherance to the enemies, to fill vp the ditches, beganne to set fire on them, and to burne them vp: which fire encreasing too exceedingly, inuaded all the Citie, and consumed the Monasterie of S. Peter, together with the city, but this acte was grieuously reuenged on them very spéedily, for before al the city was burnt, the Danish nauy came, to wit, on the Monday, being the 21. of September, and breaking the castles, the same day slewe aboue 3000. Normans, sauing William Mallet and his wife, two of their children, and fewe other: which done, they returned to their ships with innumerable booties. Which doing, when it was signified to the king, he forthwith assembled an army, & hasted with an angry minde towards Northumberland, not ceasing to waste that Countrey all that winter, to kill men, and to doe all the mischiefe that was possible. In the meane time, messengers being sent to the Danish Earle Esborne, king William promised to giue to him no small summe of money, and to permit his army freely to take victuals, by the sea coast, with this condition onely, that winter being past, he should depart without battell. Esborne being too greedie of golde and siluer, not without great shame, yéelded to his requests, and departed without more claime of this kingdome for that time.

King William compounderh with the Danes to depart without battaile.

By reason that the Normans had wasted England in Northumberland, and in certaine other places in the yéere before, nowe this yéere, and the next that followed, such a dearth encreased through all England, especially through Northumberland, and the countries next adioyning, that men were faine to eate horse flesh, cattes, dogges, and mans flesh: for all the land that lay betwixt Durham and Yorke, late waste without inhabitantes, and people to till the ground, for the space of nine yéeres, except onely the territorie of Saint Iohn of Beuerlake.

A great dearth so that mans flesh was eaten of men.

When Egelsine Bishoppe of Durham heard of the comming of king William, hée and the elders taking aduise together, fledde to the Church of holy Iland: but in the meane season the kings armie being scattered through out all places whatsoeuer betwixt Tese and Tine, found nothing but empty houses euerie where: and then was brent the Church of Saint Paule at Jarrow.

The Church of Durham being bereft of all ecclesiasticall seruice, was lefte like a desert, but Lent being at hand, when peace was made, the bishop returned ned againe, and entred the church the first of Aprill, where he found the Image of the Crucifer cast to the ground, and altogether spoyled of the ornamentes. Mariannus.

Through the counsell of William Fitz Osberd Earle of Hereford, and certaine other, in the Lent season king William caused the monasteries of all England to be searched, and the money which the richer sort of the English people, for the cruell spoiling which they saw in him had laide vp in the same Abbeies, he caused to be brought into his treasurie. Monasteries rifled.
Roger of Wendouer saieth, he bereaued al the Monasteries and Abbeies in England, of their golde and siluer, sparing neither Chalis nor Shrine, appropriating the said monasteries and Abbeies to himselfe: he brought vnder knights seruice, all those Bishoprickes and Abbeies that held baronies, which had beene free from all secular bondage, appointing them how many souldiours they should finde him and his successors in time of warres. R. Windouer.

A great councell was holden at Winchester by commandement of the king, who also was present at the same, Pope Alexander consenting thereunto, sent by his Legates Ermenfred bishop, and the Priestes, Iohn and Peter Cardinals of the sea Apostolike, who exhibited there his authoritie. In which councell Stigand Archbishop of Canterburie was degraded for three causes, to wit, because he did possesse vniustly the bishoprickes of Winchester, together with his archbishopricke, and because that whilest the Archbishop Robert was yet liuing, he had not only taken vpon him the archbishopricke, but also in celebrating of diuine seruice, for a time vsed the Pall, which remained at Canterbury, when he was expulsed vniustly by violence out of Englande, and after receiued the Pall of Benedict, whom the church of Rome did excommunicate, for that hee had ingraued the Apostolike Sea by money. His brother also Agelwine Bishop of the East Angles, and diuers Abbots were there degraded by the kinges meanes, that other of his nation might bee placed in their rowmes, for the confirmation of his kingdome, many, aswell Bishops as Abbots, who for no euident cause were depriued of their honour, and by the king vnto their liues end holden in prison. Mariannus. Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury is deposed.

When the feast of S. Iohn Baptist was at hand, Earle Esborne with his nauy which had wintred in Humber, (according to appointment made) returned into Denmarke, but his brother Swain king of Denmarke banished him that realme, for the money which (against his will, and the will of the Danes) hee had receiued of king William: whereby it appeareth, that Swaine K. of Denmarke surceased not his claime to the crowne of England, as some haue affirmed, namely in a fable, vntruely intituled, The true portraiture of the countenances, and attires of the Kings of England, &c. collected by T. T. wherein his wordes be these, Will. of Normandie, &c. toke the crowne vpon him by election of the estates (the contrarie whereof is true) then seeking to stoppe titles, he imprisoned Edgare Etheling, the onely true heire of the Saxons blood, and by meanes of Ethelbert Archbishop of Hamborow, for mony procureth Swaine king of Denmarke to surceasse the claime of the Danes; hauing thus established his affaires, &c. which errour the saide T. T. hath framed by misinterpreting of his Authour Adam Bremensis, whose wordes be these: Inter Suen & Bastardum Earle Esborne returneth toward Denmarke.
The Danes made continuall claime to the crowne of England many yeeres, as by the history following may appeare.
Adam Bremensis.

ſtardum perpetuâ contentio de Anglia fuit, licet noſter pontifex muneribus Guilielmi perſuaſus, inter reges pacem firmare voluerit. Which is to be Engliſhed thus: betweene Swene and the baſtard, there was continuall contention, although our Biſhop being perſwaded with the giftes of William, would haue eſtabliſhed peace betweene the kings. Marke how little this authour ſcrueth to his interpretation, and now to our hiſtorie.

King William hauing placed a Canon of Bayon, named Thomas the elder, in the Archbiſhoppes Sea of Yorke, doth alſo now call for Lanfranke Abbot of Cane in Normandie, that was a Lumbard, borne in the citie of Papia, a man skilfull in ſcience, prudent in counſell and gouernment of thinges, and for religion and life moſt holie, him he made Archbiſhop of Canterburie. This Lanfranke being conſecrated archbiſhop of Canterbury, he conſecrated Thomas Archbiſhop of Yorke, but not before he had made profeſſion of ſubiection to the ſaid Lanfranke Archbiſhop of Canterburie, which the ſaid Thomas was ordered by the king to do, and did before his conſecration.

An. reg. 5. 1071. W. Malmeſ.

Lanfranke Archbiſhop of Canterbury being in ſuch fauour with king William, that the ſame William thought not good to deny any thing that he requeſted, procured by his induſtrie that the ſaid king left his euill cuſtome of ſelling his priſoners, which he toke in Ireland: which was a thing hardly granted to him, and to Wolſtane Biſhop of Worceſter, the gaines that the king had by the ſale of thoſe Iriſhmen was ſuch.

Hereward.

Eglewine biſhop of Durham, Earle Morcare, Siward ſurnamed Bran, and Hereward, a right valiant perſon, with many other, went into woods and wild places of the countrey, becauſe they were not able to abide the force of king William: and after they had done much harme in many places, at the laſt, they came into the Ile of Ely by boate, and choſe there a place in the Fennes, they make Hereward their Captaine of the warre, where hee did manie warlike feates, ſo often ouercomming his enemies, ſo manie times deluding them, that he deſerued perpetuall commendations, for as long as he could, he ſuſtained the ruines of his countrey decaying.

Wiſbech Caſtle builded. Hereward caſtle builded.

Whereof when as king William was aduertiſed, hee gathered a great power, marched thitherward, and ſtopped their going out of the Ile on the Eaſt ſide thereof, and cauſed a bridge or cauſway of two miles in length to bee made in the Weſt part. Hee alſo (ſaieth Roger of Wendouer) builded a Caſtle from the ground vppe, in a place called Wiſbech. Whereupon they of the Ile perceiuing themſelues ſo incloſed, they raiſed a Forte or Caſtle of turffes and timber in the mariſhes, which by the inhabitantes of that countrey, is called the Caſtle of Hereward: this caſtle they raiſed againſt the aſſaulting assaulting of the kings hoste, and fought with their enemies many daies together. From thence the king went to the castle of Grantbridge, from whence, as the necessitie of the time required, set forth diuers companies to besiege and trouble the next places vnto the Ile, for the king himselfe was called vnto other businesse, and enforced to repaire into Normandie, to speake with Philip king of France. In the meane time Hereward, and the nobles of England obtained by price, which they were not able to doe by praier, and wan the Scots to take their part against the Normans. And also the Danes fauouring them, did greatly desire to triumph ouer the Normans. Further, there were within the Ralme great commotions on euerie part, as well by the Normans, as other against the king, by perswasion of Earle Ralfe de Walser, calling Hereward into that faction, and others the nobles of England, as Morcare, Ethelm, Walcheum, Siward, and Edgare. At which time Hereward leauing the Ile of Ely, committed to him for safegard, went towards the English, to whom a valiant company of young souldiers did ioine themselues, which no man durst encounter.

Malcolme king of Scots with an innumerable multitude of Scots, passing through Cumberland, and turning aside towards the East, did cruelly forrage all Tesidale, and the places nigh adioyning: but when they came to a place called Hundredskeld, after they had there slaine certaine noble men of the English nation, the king of Scots sent home part of his army laden with spoiles. Then he set vpon Holdernesse and destroied the same with a sodaine desolation: then raging through the grounde of Saint Cuthbert of Durham, he cruellie depriued all men of their goods, and manie of their liues. At the same time also did he consume with fire, the Church of Saint Peter at Weremouth, and diuers other Churches, with them that were thither fledde to saue themselues. And whiles the saide Malcolme rode about the riuer bankes, delighting his eies with the cruell acts committed against the English people: it was tolde him that Edgar Etheling with his sisters of the blood royall, and manie other noble men, banished from their lawfull inheritance, were arriued at that hauen: he came to them, and shaking hands with them, gaue them and al theirs licence with his assured peace to dwell in his kingdome as long as they would.

Church at Weremouth burned.

Besides these robberies of the Scots, Gospatrike of Northumberland did assaile Cumberland, and made there great slaughter and burnings, and after returned with great bootie, to a strong fortresse at Babbanbrigh, where hee with his fellowes inclosed themselues: for at that time Cumberland was vnder the iurisdiction of king Malcolme, who when he heard what was done by Gospatrike, he charged his souldiours to spare none of the English nation: wherupon, pitifull it was to beholde, olde men, and women, some were killed with swordes, some pierced with speares, the young babes taken from the mothers pappes were cast vp into the aire, and falling downe againe, were receiued on their speares, and then the speare staues striken into the ground in a bushment together: but the young men and maidens, such as were thought meete to labour, were bound, and forced to be slaues. Malcolme beholding the teares of these, to encrease his tyrannie, commanded them to be scourged in their going forward.

A Synode wherein was prouued that the Archbishop of Yorke should be subiect to the archbishop of Canterburie.

This yeere, by the commaundement of Pope Alexander, and consent of king William the Conquerour, in the presence of the saide king, his bishops, Prelates, and nobilitie, the title of Primacie, the which Lanfranke Archbyshoppe of Canterbury did claime ouer the Church of Yorke, and concerning the ordering of certaine Byshops, whome men were vncertaine vnto which Archbishoppe they shoulde especially belong, was examined and tried out: where, by the authoritie of olde Writings it was prooued and declared, that the Church of Yorke ought to bee subiect vnto the Church of Canterburie, and ought faithfully to obey the same, in all matters pertaining vnto Christian Religion, as being Primate of all England. And the Archbishop of Canterbury, as Metropolitane, graunted the Archbishop of Yorke and his successours, to haue vnder their iurisdiction, the bishoprieke of Durham, that is to saie, Lindisserne, and from the great Riuer of Humber vnto the vttermost part of the borders of Scotland, and also all whatsoeuer doeth appertaine to the parish of Yorke vpon the side the Riuer, so that if the Archbishop of Canterburie doe summon a councell in any place, the Archbishop of Yorke and all his Suffraganes, Subiects and Clearkes shall be there present at his commaundement, and shall be obedient vnto his canons and orders, &c. at Windsore.

King William went into Scotland, and Malcolme king of Scots did homage vnto him.

King William hauing in his companie Edrike surnamed Syluaticus, or Wilde, marched towardes Scotland with a naule by Sea, and with an armie of horsemen by land, to haue subdued Scotland, for that Malcolme had in the yéere last before passed, so cruelly desolated the borders of his kingdome.

Excommunicate by H. 4. Emp. of Germany.

In the which iourney, when king William came vnto Durham, hee entred the Church with great deuotion for to pray, and afterwardes hee inquiring of the life and conuersation of the Confessour Cuthbert, and also of the antiquitie of that Bishoprieke, hee confirmed all the Liberties of that same Church, &c.

This being done, King William went into Scotland, against whome King Malcolme came vnto a place called Aberinthey, and became his man. And after king William deprined Gospatrike of his Earledome, laying vnto his charge, that he had consulted with them that slewe the Earle Robert Co-men of Durham, and that hee was among the enemies, when the Normans were slaine at Yorke: who being expulsed, Walthæus was extolled vnto that Earledome, being due vnto him both by father and mother, for he was the son of Earle Siward by Elfred the daughter of Aldred sometime Earle.

At the same time when king William returned from Scotland, he builded a Castle at Durham, wherein the Bishop might keepe him and his safe, from such as made assaultes. Castle at Durham builded.

This yeere Eglewine Bishop of Durham, who had beene by king William committed to prison first at Abindune, and since at Westminster deceased, and was buried there in S. Nicholas chappell.

King William went into Normandie, which Dukedome was then rebellious against him, but with strong hand he subdued the Citie of Mayne, and the whole Countrey, especially by the helpe of Englishmen, whome he applied in these affaires, they spoiled the cities, townes, vineyards, and cornefields, whereby they greatly weakned and empouerished that prouince. Clito Edgar at this time came forth of Scotland, and passing through England, went into Normandy, and was there agréed with king VVilliam. Annoreg. 7. 1073 R. Wendouer. Clito Edgar.

About this time the Monkes of Ely, seeing the miseries of themselues, and of the whole Iland, determined to trie the kings clemencie, for there was such a dearth in the land, as the like had not beene seene, for al prouision being spent, many thousands died through hunger, since it was now the seuenth yere since they had beene besieged, wherfore taking their iourney to Warwike a famous towne, they came to the king with great reuerence, commending themselues, and all that they had to his clemencie. Thurstane and his Monkes standing before king William, besæched him for the mercy of God to turne his displeasure from their Citie, promising faithfully hereafter to obey him. The Abbot said, that if the king would restore vnto the Abbey their possessions, violently taken from them, hee might haue sure entrance into the Ile: which the king granted, and commanded William de Warren, and Gilbert de Clare, that they shoulde become pledges for the same. Whereupon the Abbot conferred with them about the regathering together of their possessions, who (going after to his owne) did first instruct Gilbert de Clare, and Earle VVarren of the manner of the rebellion, willing them not to feare for the often repulse of the enemies, for they should haue his counsell and helpe, whereby the king might vnderstand that the power of the enemies was weakened. The Monkes of Ely submit themselues to king William.

Whereupon the king began to triumph, as though he had alreadie got the victorie: hee assembled therefore as great an armie as he coulde both of horsemen and footemen, he toke his iourney to Ely, he prepareth his engines, laieth siege to the place which was of most defence, and daily laboured to ouerthrow that which Canutus neither with wit, or strength, with policie, or sworde could at any time subdue.

At length, though with difficulty wonderful to be declared, he safely brought his army nérer then anie one thought he could haue done, which was euen to the waters of Ely, the Normans passed Cotinglade, neither did it grieue the king first to passe ouer many riuers, although he was almost drowned at the King William in perill of drowning at point Gale.

point Gale: hee ceased not for marishes or other never so dangerous, till the sounding voice of victorie quickly drave the enemies out of the Iland, but the Normans compassing the enemies, did in a moment slaie a thousand of them, wherefore the king as soone as he had entred the Iland, went about the moores, marishes, and crooked waies, and doth with siege inclose the whole company of his enemies. These armed men are brought forth, first the Captaines, then the better sort of the other, whereof he imprisoneth some, and put out the eies, cut off the hands and feete of other some, and suffered the multitude of the common people to depart.

Wens eies put out, and their hands and feets cut off.

In this Ile he found aboundance of beasts and cattell manifolde to recompence his slaine horses and other domages. Edwine is taken, and with him many persons of name & power, who were bound in streit prison, but Morcare was escaped: forthwith the king sent a great company to keep the gates of the monastery, to the end the Monks with crosses and other ceremonies should not meete him, and entreate for pardon at his hand, whereunto hee must needes have graunted. Wherefore when he came to the monasterie, he strode aloft from the tombe of Saint Etheldred, and hurled a marke of golde upon the Altar. Which done, and having placed a garrison within the walles of the Monkes: he disposed of Cantbridge, Huntingdon, and Bedford shires, committing them to such men as he had brought out of France: and likewise placing a strength of Frenchmen in the Castle of Alreched, he went out of the Iland, the same way by which he entred into it: there was no diuine seruice since that unto the xxvii. of October, the time was so troublesome. After the king was departed, the Church doores were fast locked: and Gilbert de Clare entering the monastery to see the monks places of offices, in the end came into the refectory, & finding the Monks at dinner, said to them, Oh wretches and slouth full persons, had you none other time to dine in, but whilest the king remained in your Church: With which wordes they all rising, ranne to the Church: but when they found not the king there, they were greatly troubled: therefore having no hope but in God, they required Gilbert de Clare, that by his meanes they might obtaine a firme peace, which in the ende taking upon him to doe, he went to the king, and with great difficultie obtained the same: with condition, that when the Monkes came before him, they should by prayer or price pacifie his displeasure against them.

King William his offering to S. Etheldred of Ely.

This done, he brought the Monkes before the king to Witchford, where he then sojourned, who being with much adoe brought in favour with the king by the saide Gilbert, and other noble men, promised seuen hundred markes of siluer. For the providing whereof, the Monkes were enforced to spoile and sell the iewelles and ornamentes of their Church, and then repaire to Cantbridge to paie that money to the kings officers: but one groat being lacking of the said summe, by the deceit of such as did tell it, the waight was not iust, by so much. Whereof when the King had understoode, hee was greatly offended with them, denying unto them all manner of hope of any further peace. Whereupon they were driuen to make an other composition of a thousand markes, for the which they were faine for to spoile, and to sell

King William the Conquerour with a great power of Englishmen went into Normandie, which rebelled, and subdued it, spoiling the cities, townes, vineyardes, &c. W. Malmes. Annoreg. 8. 1074.

Gregorie the seuenth, Pope, excommunicated all committers of symonie, and remoued married Priestes from executing diuine Seruice, whereof rose great troubles in England.

Radulph whom lately before king William had made Earle of Norffolke and Suffolke, or, as some write, of the East Angles, nowe toke to wife (against the kings commaundement) the daughter of William Fitz Osbert, sister to Roger Earle of Hereford, and celebrating moste royally the marriage feast, with a great multitude of noble men at Erningham in Grantbridgeshire, conceiuing a pride of his marriage, for that his wife was the kinges kinswoman, euen vpon the marriage daie, when the feast was solemnly kept; and the riotous superfluity of the Englishmen was entred into the Normans throates, the guests being drunken and full of wine, with a long circumstance of words, he opened his minde and purpose, whereunto the guests consented with a great showt. There was Roger Earle of Hereford, Radulphes wines brother: there was Waldeofus Earle of Northampton and Huntington, and many other, who all conspired the kings death. But on the next morrow, when the heat of the wine was disgested, and the mindes of some of them come to better temper, the most part of them repented of that they had promised, and slipping away from the feast, Waldeofus as soone as hee could went to Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterbury, and toke penance for his othe which he had receiued against his will, and through his aduise went to the king, then being in Normandie, and opening the matter vnto him, yelded to his mercie. The other Nobles proceeding in their begunne conspiracie, went to their Castles, and raised their people to open rebellion. But Wolstane Bishop of Worcester, with a great bande of men of warre resisted the Earle of Hereford, so that hee might not (passing the Riuer of Seuerne) ioine to Earle Radulph at the appointed place with his campe, in whose companie was Aglewine Abbot of Euesham, with his people, hauing called to his aide Vrse sheriffe of Worcester, and Walter de Lacie with their men, and other multitudes of common people.

But Odo Bythoppe of Bayon, and Godfrey Bishop of Constance assembling a mightie armie as well of Englishmen as of Normans, came to encounter Earle Radulph being encamped at Grantbridge, where earle Radulph perceiuing that his enterprise wanted force, fearing the number of them that came against him, he secretly fledde from thence to Norwitch, where committing the Castle to his wife and knights, he getteth himselfe to shippe, and fled into little Britaine, whom his enemies pursuing, slewe all those of his men that they might come to: and after this they besiege the Castle, till that peace was granted, and licence to the Countesse and her people to depart the realme, and so she followed her husband.

King William returned out of Normandy.

These thinges being done, the king in the haruest returning forth of Normandie, put Earle Roger of Hereford in prison, wherein hee remayned all the dayes of his life: and all the Welshmen that had beene at the marriage, he caused to haue their eies put out, their handes cut off, hanged on gibbets, or to be banished at the least. Earle Waltheofus also was committed to prison, although that hee went to the King, and had obtayned of him a promise of pardon.

Edgitha late Quéene of Englande, wife to king Edwarde, called (of some) the Simple, or (of other) Confessor, daughter to Duke Godwine, and sister to Harold late king of England, departed this life at Winchester, whose corps by the kings commandement was brought to Westminster, and there by her husband solemnelie enterred: shee had a Tombe of siluer and golde curiously wrought. This Quéene Edgitha professed on her death bed, that notwithstanding shee had béene manie yeares wife vnto king Edward, yet now shee died pure virgine.

Ingulphus.

King William banished certaine rebelles, others hee dismembred, as by putting out their eies, and chopping off their handes. The earles Waltheofus, and Roger, by iudiciall sentence, hee condemned vnto more streite prisons.

At this time (saieth Ingulphus) Brand, Herewards vncle, Abbot of Peterborowe, being dead, succéeded Thorold a stranger, by the gift of king William, which thing Hereward taking in ill part, that a stranger should rule ouer his kinred, he inuaded Peterborow, and chased awaie the Abbot. And though in the sayde Abbots defence, Iuo Talbois a most mightie Norman, and by the gift of king William made Lorde of all Holland in Lincolneshire, Hereward tooke the sayde Iuo in open battell, and set him free for a great summe of monete. To this Iuo Talbois king William had giuen to wife Lucie, the Sister of the earles Edwyne and Morcare, with all the landes and tenementes that the said earles had appertained.

Hereward tooke Iuo Talbois and ransomed him.

At this time moreouer, to encrease the calamitie, happened the cruel beheading of earle Waltheofe or Walden: and although Lanfranke Archbyshoppe of Canterburie his Confessour, affirmed him to be free from the conspiracy and faction, and that if it chanced him to die in that case, he should for his innocencie be counted a martyre, yet his most wicked wife, coueting to be married newe, did most haynously hasten the death of her husband. Iudith Earle Walthéofes widow, after the decease of her husband, with her two daughters, had the Lordshippe of Huntington giuen to her in the name of a dowrie, and there made their abode, vntill such time as the king was willing to marrie her to a knight borne in France, named Simon Syluaticus or Seintliz. For hither came two brethren to the aide of the king, and to serue him with forty soldiers horsemen, their names were Guarnerus le Riche, and Simon de Sentliz, and their fathers name was Ranulph le Riche, after whose death the eldest son, Guarnerus went backe into his native Countrey, and succéeded in his fathers possessions: but Simon the younger sonne remained here with the king, vnto whom the king gaue the Towne of Northampton, and the Hundred of Fackeley, hee builded the Castle of Northampton, and also the Abbey of Saint Andrewes there. The king would haue giuen vnto him Iudith the widowe of Earle Walthéofus, but shée refused him, because that hee halted on the one legge: in wrath whereof, king William bestowed vpon him the whole honour of Huntington, and so was he called Earle of Northampton and of Huntington, &c.

This yéere mine ofte alleadged Author Ingulphus, was by the kinges gift made Abbot of Crowland, which Ingulphus, of himselfe, and his vocation to the Abbacie of Croyland writeth thus: I Ingulphus, an humble seruant of God and Saint Guthlake, and of the monastery of Croyland, borne in England, and of English parents, in the most beautifull City of London, for to attaine to learning, I was first put to Westminster, afterward to Oxforde to studie. When I had profited in reading Aristotle aboue manie mine equals in age, I studied also Tullies Rhetorikes: waxing elder, loathing the base estate of my parents daily more and more, I desired to léaue my father and mothers house, and to be in kings and princes pallaces, to be attired in silkes and gorgious apparell. And beholde, noble William, nowe our king of England, then Duke of Normandie, came to London, to talke with his cousin king Edward then king of England, with a great traine attending vpon him, vnto whome I soone ioyned my selfe, thrusting forwarde, to dispatch all businesse arising, I became in a little time knowen to Duke William, and was of him verie well beloued, and with him I sayled into Normandie, there was I made his Secretarie, I ruled the whole court of the Duke at my pleasure, to the enuie of manie.

Ingulphus borne in London, brought vp in learning at Westminster and at Oxford, made abbot of Croiland.

At length it was noysed, that many Archbishops and Bishops of the Empire, and many other Princes woulde go to Ierusalem, I among other, as well souldiers as clearkes, with the licence of my Lorde the Duke, prepared my selfe. Comming vnto Constantinople, wee did reuerence to the Emperour Alexes, &c. Departing from thence through Licia, we fell into the hands of Arabian robbers that toke from vs much money: wee came at the length to Ierusalem, where the Patriarke Sophronius receiued vs honourablie, and brought vs to the Church of the holie Sepulture, and so to other places. In the spring returning home by Rome, and so into Normandie, I hasted to the Abbey of Fountauill, where I receiued the habite of a Monke, meaning to purge and amend, as the grace of the holy Ghost inspired mee, the offences of my youth, and ignorances, &c. At what time duke William vnderstanding of the death of king Edward his cousin expected a fauourable wind in the port of Saint Walarike, to saile ouer into England, I presented vnto him the Abbots gift, to wit, twelue yong men chosen on horsebacke and armed, with an hundred markes towards his expences in that voyage, and I returned to the Monasterie. After certaine yéres Walketelus Abbot of Croyland was deposed of his office; King William sent to the Abbot of Fontauill for me, &c. To London I came to the king, there inuested of the staffe and pastorall office of Cloyland Monastery, and consecrated on the day of the nativity of our Lord. On the day of the conuersion of S. Paul I first came to Croyland, and was installed, 1075.

The king passing ouer the sea, went into little Brytaine, and besieged then the Castell of Dolence, belonging to earle Ralph, but Philip king of France came with a great power vpon them, and tooke all victualles from them, so that king William was forced to leaue his siege with the losse of manie souldiours and horses, with much other substance: and not long after king William made peace with them.

An. reg. 10. 1076 R. Windouer. Walter Bishop of Durham, contrary to his Bishoplike dignity intermedled himselfe with secular and worldly matters, and bought of king William the earledome of Northumberland, and then playing the part of a Shiriffe, set in secular and lay court, determining of matters, extorting infinite Summes of money, as well of the Noble men, as of the others of that same Prouince, &c.

An. reg. 11. 1077 About the same time, Robert the kinges sonne, vnto whome, when as hee had conquered Englande, hee had giuen the Dukedome of Normandie, in the presence of Philip king of France, because nowe his Father would not suffer him to possesse the Dukedome of Normandie, the saide Robert went into France, and by the ayde of the same King Philip, committed great robberies, and tooke great praies in Normandy, and burned Townes and and slewe the people, doing no small veration vnto his father, so that king William the Conquerour fighting a battaile against his sonne Robert before the Castell of Gerborie in France, was vnhorsed himselfe, and his sonne William was wounded, and manie of his familie were slaine. Wherefore king William the Conquerour cursed his sonne Robert, the which curse hee felt euidentlie before hee dyed, for there did nothing prosper with him. William Conquerour curseth his son Robert.

Paul a Monke of Caen, is made Abbot of Saint Albones, who in short space by the counsell and ayde of Lanfranke Archbyshop of Canterburie, he builded verie trimmelie a newe Church and Cloyster there, and all offices, and adourned the same Church with manie good Bookes, and rich ornaments. An. reg. 12. 1078 Abbey of Saint Albons new builded.

Gundulphus Byshop of Rochester was surueiour of the great workes of the Tower of London, which Tower was builded by the commandement of king William. And this Gundulfe founded the Abbey of Mayling in Kent for nuns: he builded part of the Castell of Rochester, and founded the Hospitall of Saint Bartholomew without the East gate of that Citie, which is in some Recordes called Chetham, &c. Tower of London builded. Rochester castle builded. Hospitall of Chetham, &c.

Walter Byshop of Durham, borne in Lorraine as is aforesaide, is slaine by the Northumbers, in a place called Gatesh ed, in reuenge of a Noble man named Leulfus, before slaine by meanes of the Bishoppes Chaplaine named Leofwinus. The sayde Leulfus in manie partes of England inioyed great possessions by right of inheritance, but because the Normans euerie where practised their cruelty, he got himselfe with all his family to Durham, he had to wife Algitha, daughter to Earle Aldred, of whome hee begate two sonnes Vtred and Morcare. An. reg. 13. 1079 Marianus.

This Leulfus was so beloued of the Bishoppe, that without his counsell, hee would doe nothing of anie great weight, for the which cause the Bishops Chaplain Leofwinus greatly hated the said Leulfus, and therefore on a time going

ting out of the courthouse, or mete hall called vnto him Gilbert, a man to whom the byshop had committed the earledome of Northumberland vnder him to be gouerned, he required him to reuenge his displeasure against the said Leulfus, and as soone as he could to put him to death, which hee performed in this manner, gathering together his men of warre, one night went vnto the village where Leulfus dwelt, and there in his owne house, together with all his family, slew him, which thing being knowne, the Byshoppe sore vexed in displeasure therewith, tooke his hoode from his head, threwe it to the ground, and saide to Leofwine his Chaplaine, these thinges are done by thy meanes Leofwine, and therefore I will that thou know for certaine that thou hast killed me, and all my familie with the sword of thy tongue. Hauing this said, he got him straight into the Castell, and forthwith sending messengers throughout Northumberland, he caused to be declared to all men, that he was nothing priuie to the death of Leulfus, but was now desirous to banish his slaier Gilbert and all his fellowes in that action, and for himselfe he was ready to purge himselfe according to the Ecclesiasticall lawes. This being signified, the Byshop and the friends of him that was slaine, professing to be at peace together, appointed a day and place of meeting together, where they might establish a more firme peace; nowe when the day came, they met at the place appointed, but the Byshop refusing to talke with them abroad, abode in the Church thereby with his Cleargy and knights, and when the talke was began, once or twise he sent out to them of his counsailers, to make an attonement, but they would not agree, because they beleeued that Leulfus was slaine by the Byshops consent, for the night after the slaughter of Leulfus, not onelie Leofwine did receiue Gilbert and his complices into his house familiarlie, but also the Byshoppe did the like. Whereupon, all those that were found out of the Byshops place they slew, verie fewe excepted, that gate awaie by flight, which thing perceiued by the Byshoppe, he to satisfie the furie of his enimies, commanded his cousin Gilbert (whose life was sought) to depart out of the Church, whome as hee went, the men of armes followed with speare and sword, till they had slaine him and all their enimies, sparing onlie two Englishmen that were seruants to the Byshop, they also slewe Leofwine the Deane of Durham, and other of the Priestes, as they could finde them out of the Church. When the Byshop perceiued that by no meanes their fury mought be pacified, except the head of the author were cut off, he besought Leofwine to go forth, which when hee could not get him to doe, hee went himselfe to the Church doores, and besought them to graunt him his life, which when they refused to doe, hee couering his head with the skirt of his garment, went forth, and straightwaies with the enimies swordes hee was dispatched out of his life: after this they bade Leofwine come foorth, but hee would not, whereupon they set the Church walles and rouffe on fier, which hee continued a while, but when he felt the bitter flames about him, and began to smart, he lept out, and being cut in peeces, suffered for his wickednes.

Byshop of Durham slaine.

Lib. Dunelm.

This detestable slaughter of the Byshop was committed on the 14. daie of May, when he had sate Byshop nine yeares, and two monethes, the Monks of Yarrow sailed to the place, tooke the bodie of their Byshop into their Shippe, which which body they could hardly know for the number of woundes, being also spoiled of his garments, the body they cary to their Monasterie, which being translated thence to Durham, was there buried, but with no such solemnitie as other Bishops had béene buried, for his murderers roued vp and downe all the Citie, and assaulted the Castell, but could not prevaile; whereupon at length they dispersed themselues here and there, and were consumed with many calamities, wandring like runnagates, and banished people, for when king William had knowledge of these things, he sent his brother Odo Bishop of Bayon, and manie Nobles of his realme with a great army, to destroy Northumberland, who whilest they sought to reuenge the death of the Bishoppe, brought all that land to desolation, many of the sely people that remained at home, they either commanded to be beheaded, or otherwaies to be dismembred, many being vniustly charged, were forced to raunsome themselues with money. Northumberland spoiled.

The said Odo toke certaine ornaments of the Church, among the which there was a Bishops staffe, marueilous for the matter and workmanship, for it was made of Saphyre stone, who hauing set a garrison in the Castell returned.

This yére was finished the booke named Domes day, or Domus Dei, being a perfect survey of the whole land, which booke remayneth in the kings Exchequer at Westminster, of the which booke & making thereof, Ingulphus writeth thus. An. reg. 14. 1080 Domes daie booke, a register of the whole realme, howe many acres of land, &c. Ingulphus.

King William for the taxing of his whole lande, toke this order in all England, there was not an hide of land, but he knewe the valewe thereof, and the possessor also, neither metreno place there was, but it was valued in the kings role, the rents and profits, the possession and the possessor, were made manifest and knowne vnto the king, according to the fidelitie of taxors, which being chosen out of euerie Countrey, taxed or seised their owne Territories, or made their owne rent role. These men well willers and friends to our Monasterie, weighed not our Monasterie to the full prise, nor to the true measure thereof, preuenting and prouiding vpon zealous affection towardes vs, for the kinges taxations, and other burdens that after might befall.

This role is called the role of Winton, and of the Englishmen for the generalitie thereof, containing wholie all the tenements of the whole land, it is named Domesdaie. Such a role and very like, did king Aelfred once set forth, in which he taxed all the land of Englande by Shires, Hundreds, and Tythings.

And this role, as is before noted, was called the role of Winton, because it was laide in Winchester to bee kept. Which Citie was the head of the West Saxons kingdome, comming vnto him by inheritance: At this time among all the particular kingdomes of England most noble and famous. In this role of Winchester, so most of all called, because it was made after the example of the other, were taxed and set downe, the Earledomes, Hundreds, Tythings, Woods, Parks, and all Farmes, in euery territory, or precinct, howe manie carncates of lande, howe manie ploughlandes, and acres, what pastures and fennes, or marishes, what tenements and tenants were conteined, &c. Thus much Ingulphus. The Role of Winton.

Queene Matild deceased. Matild the Quéene, Daughter to Baldwine Earle of Flanders, and wife to King William deceased, King William had manie children by this Matild, whereby shee prouoked him to loue her, certaine it is a little variance was growne betweene them in their latter yéeres, for his sonne Robert, whome men said his mother, out of the kings coffers did maintaine with warlike power, but king William himselfe declared that the fauour of matrymoniall loue was not diminished by that, whereas she died 4. yeares before him, he did honour her with roiall obsequie and funeralles, and did with teares mourne for her death manie daies after, and from that time forth (it was said) he abstained from all voluptuousnesse: The Quéene was buried at Caine in Normandie in the Monasterie of Nunnes, which she had founded and dedicated to the holie Trinitie.

Richard the kings sonne died. Richard the kings sonne Duke of Beorn died in the new Forrest, and was buried at Winchester with this Epitaph. Hic iacet Ricardus Filius Willielmi senioris Beornię dux.

An. reg. 16. 1082 This Richard king Williams seconde sonne was a goodly ladde, and such a one as of his age did attempt great matters, in whome his noble father had very good opinion: but a bitter death did sone deuour him in his young age, men said that the Déere in the new Forrest, by reason of a cloude or mist of infected aire, got a disease of goring, and so spoyled him. This new Forrest is a place which king William the father of Richard, had laid wast, ouerthrowing townes, villages, and Churches, by the space of 30. miles and more, bringing the same into a chase for déere, an horrible thing it was to sée, that where before men did inhabite and dwell, and where God was honored: now Déere, Goates, and such other kind of wild beasts do wantonly course about, & not so much as made to the vse of men. Wherefore it is declared for certaine, that in the same Forrest, William his son, and his nephew Richard the son of Robert Duke of Normandy, did by the seuere iudgement of God find their death, Wil. with an arrow that was shot in his breast, and Richard had his neck broken, or as some say, as he rode through the wood on horse backe, he was hanged vp by the chaps vpon the bough of a tree. New forrest in Hamphire.

King William in his life time shewed great fauour vnto his mother, who before his father was dead, had married a certain man of mean substance called Herlewinus of Canteruile, by him king William had brethren, one named Robert, whome he made Earle of Morton, a grosse and dull witted man: The other brother was called Odo, who when he was Duke, he promoted to the Bishoppicke of Bayon, and when he was king, he made him Earle of Kent, he being a man of subtill wit, was vnder the king Vicelord of al England, after the death of William fitz Osberne, insomuch that hee being wonderfull craftie and subtill in heaping vp of treasure, and one of a maruellous obstinacie, being absent from the citizens of Rome, had almost bought the Papacy by stuffing the bagges of straungers with letters and money. And (by reason of the opinion, that all men had of him, that he should go to Rome to bee Pope) all matters of controuersie throughout the whole Realme were brought vnto him, which matter the king tooke verie euill, and laid him in prison as shall be shewed in place conuenient, saying that he would not apprehend the Bishop of Bayon, but that he would apprehend the Earle of Kent, his seruantes being constrained thereunto with threats, bewrayed such plenty of golde, that the heape of yellow mettall did exceede the opinions of all men: moreouer, mane bagges full of grounden gold were drawne out of Riuers, which hee had buried in certaine places. Herlewine married Arlots mother to king William. Odo Bishop of Bayon.

William Bishop of Durham, by licence of the King and the Nobles of the Realme, went to Rome and obtained of Pope Gregorie the seuenth, to bring the Monks from Yarrow, and Wermouth into the Cathedrall Church of Durham, he gaue to them lands, Churches, ornaments &c. all which king William confirmed by his Charter. An. reg. 17. 1083

A wicked sedition arose betweene the Monkes, and Thurstane the vntoward Abbot of Glastenburie, which Thurstane king William had taken forth of the Monasterie of Cane in Normandie, and (being a man furnished with no wisedome) made him Abbot of Glastenburie. This man among other his fellowes, despising the song called Gregories song, began to counsell the Monkes to learne the song of one William of Festamps, and to sing it in the Church, which to doe when they refused, as they that had béene euer vsed not onelie Marianus. Thurstane Abbot of Glastenburie stirreth his Monkes.

in this, but in other seruice of the Church to follow the maner of the Romane Church, sodenly on a day with a company of armed men, (the Monkes not ware thereof) brake into the chapter house, and the Monkes flying through excessiue feare into the Church, euen to the high Altar, the men of warre pursuing with their darts and arrowes, shot, not sparing to hit the Crosses, Images and shrines, and ran one Monke through ẏ body with a speare, as he embraced the altar, and so slew him, an other was slaine with an arrow, lying as it were hidden vnder the altar, the other constrained of necessity, defended the mselues with formes and candlesticks of the Church, so that although they were sore wounded, they draue all the men of armes behinde the quére, and so it fell out, that two being slaine, 14. were hurt of the Monkes, and some of the men of armes, were hurt also, this matter cõming to iudgment, because it was found that the Abbot was in all the blame, the king remoued him, and set him in his house againe in Normandy, manie of the Monkes were bestowed in Bishops houses, but after the Conquerors decease, the Abbot got his Abbey againe, at his sonne William Rufus hands, buying it with 500. pound of siluer, and wandring through the possessions of the Church, certaine yéeres together from the Monasterie, ended his life miserably as he well deserued.

Of Odo Bishop of Bayon.

About this time many tempests raging in this world, certain Southsaiers of Rome declared, who should succéede vnto Hildebrand in the Popedome, they affirmed after the decease of Gregorie, Odo to bee Pope of Rome. Odo Bishop of Bayon, hearing this, who (with his brother) gouerned the Normanes and Englishmen, little estéeming the power and riches of the West kingdome, vnlesse by right of the Popedome, he might largely rule all the inhabitants of the earth, he sendeth to Rome, he buyeth a pallace, he séeketh out the Senators, whome with great gifts giuen he ioyneth with him in amitie, and his pallace he adorneth with much cost, and superfluous trimmings, he sendeth for Hugh earle of Chester, and a great company of the chiefest knights, and hartely prayeth them to goe with him into Italy: and the prodigall man, vnto his prayers addeth great promises. They, for that the Normans were light, and desirous to sée forraine Countries, straightwaies assented vnto the presumptuous Bishoppe, to whome the Princedome of Albion, and Normandie sufficed not, and consented also to forsake their huge landes, which they possessed in the West Climate, and promised by their faith to accompany the foresaide Prelate beyond the Riuer of Poo. Prudent king William, when he heard of such great preparation, allowed not thereof, but thought it to be hurtfull to his kingdome, and many others, wherefore he hastely sayleth into England, and sodenly vnlooked for in the Ile of Wight met with Odo the Bishoppe, now desirous with great pompe to saile into Normandie, and there the chiefest of his Realme being gathered together in the kings hall, the king spake in this sort.

His Oration to his nobles.

Excellent Péeres, hearken my wordes diligently, and I beseech you giue vnto mee your wholsome counsaile. Before I sailed ouer the Sea into Normandie I commended the gouernment of England to my brother the Bishop of Bayon.

In Normandie manie haue risen vp against me, and, as I may say, inward friends, and forraine foes haue invaded mee, Robert my sonne, and certaine younglings, whome I haue brought vp, and to whome I haue giuen armes, rebelled, and my false clientes, and bordering enemies cleaued vnto them, but they profited nothing, God whose seruant I am, defending me: neither yet obtained they any thing of mine, but yron in their wounds.

They of Angeow gathered together against me, whom with feare of preparation to warres I pacified, with these businesses I haue beene prouoked beyond the Sea, and there I haue staide long, and laboriously haue giuen all my endeuour to publike commodities. In the meane time my brother hath greatly oppressed England, and hath spoiled the Churches of their lands, and rents, hath made them naked of the ornaments giuen by our predecessours, and hath seduced my knights, who ought to defend England against the Danes, Irishmen, and other enemies ouertroublesome vnto me, and contemning me purposeth to traine them out beyonde the Alpes into forraine kingdomes, an ouer great dolour grieueth my heart, especiallie for the Churches of God which he hath afflicted.

The story of y^e dead man speaking not believ'd by y^e Papists.

Christian kings that haue raigned before mee, haue loued the Church of God, with honours and gifts of manie kindes, they haue inriched it, wherfore now (as we beléeue) they reft reioycing with a happy retribution in a pleasant seate. Adelbert, and Edward, Saint Oswald, Althulph, Aelfred, Edward the elder, and Edgar, and my cousin and most deare Lorde Edward haue giuen riches vnto the holy Church the spouse of God, and my brother to whom I haue committed the gouernement of the whole kingdome, violently plucketh away their gods, cruelly oppresseth the poore, with a vaine hope, stealeth awaie my knightes from me, and hath exasperated the whole Realme, by oppressing it with vniuſt tarations. Consider you worthily what is to bee done hereupon, and I beséech you insinuate it vnto me.

Odo Bysh^p of Bayon put in prison.

And when all they fearing so great a personage, doubted to pronounce sentence against him, the valiant king saide, hurtfull rashnesse is alwaies to bee repressed, oftentimes heretofore hee straue against his father, and then likewise stomacked for certaine follies, presently departed awaie to the king of France, &c. now the king committed his said brother Odo to prison, where he remained about the space of foure yéeres after, to wit, to the death of king William.

Canute king of Denmarke prepareth to inuade England.

Canute king of Denmarke, with a mightie Nauie by the assistance of his father in lawe Robert Earle of Flanders, was ready to haue come into England, whereupon king William hyring Souldiours out of all Fraunce, manie thousandes of footemen and archers, and taking some forth of Normandie, in the harueſt time returned into England, and deuided his Souldiours throughout the Realme, charging the Bishoppes, Abbots, Earles, Barons, Sheriffes, and prepositors to find them meat and drinke, but after, when he vnderstode that his enemies were impeached, and let of their purpose, hee sent

An. reg. 20. 1086

King William cauſed all England to bee deſcribed, to vnderſtand what land euerie of his Barons did poſſeſſe, how manie knightes fées, how many plough landes, howe manie villans, how many beaſtes, or cattell, yea how much readie money euerie man poſſeſſed within his kingdome, from the greateſt to the leaſt, and howe much rent euerie mans poſſeſſion might yéelde, thus the land was replete with manie miſchiefes, that came of this doing.

King William made Henry his ſon knight The order of knighthoode among the Saxons.

In the Whitſon wéeke king William honoured his ſonne Henry at Weſtminſter, where he then held his Court, with the order of knighthood, which order of knighthood, how the ſame was miniſtred I read not, but as writeth Ingulphus, In time of the Saxons before the conqueſt of the Normanes, The Engliſh mens cuſtome was, that he that ſhould be conſecrated to lawfull warfare, ſhould the euening going before the daie of his conſecration, to ſome Bythoppe, Abbot, Monke, or Prieſt, contrite and compunct, make confeſſion of his ſinnes, and abſolued, ſhould continue all night in the Church, and giue him ſelfe to praiers, deuotions, and afflictions: And on the morrowe hearing the deuine ſeruice, ſhould haue a ſwoorde put about his neeke, and communicating at the ſame ſeruice the holie myſteries of Chriſt, ſhould thencefoorth continue a lawfull knight, which cuſtome of conſecrating a knight the Normans deſpiſed.

Shortly after king William commanded that Archbiſhops, Bythops, Abbots, Earles, Barons, Vicounts, with their power of men of armes ſhould mæte him on the firſt daie of September, at Saliſbury, whither when they were come, hee cauſed the men of armes to ſweare to him fealtie againſt all men.

The ſame yéere Clito Edgar with licence obtained of the king paſſed the ſea with 200. men of armes, and went into Apulia, whoſe ſiſter Chriſtine entred in to the Monaſterie of Rumſey and was made a Nunne.

When the Normans had accompliſhed the will and pleaſure of their Lord vpon the Engliſhmen, & that there was ſcantly any noble man left of the Engliſh nation to beare any rule ouer them, but was come to paſſe ỳ it was a reproch to be called an Engliſhman: There ſprang vp wicked tolls, & cuſtoms, & the more people ſpake of equitie, the more wrong was done. Thoſe that were appointed Juſticers were the authors of all vnrighteouſneſſe, who ſo euer did take a Déere or a Goate had his eies put out, and no man durſt ſpeake againſt it, for the cruell king loued wild beaſts, as though he had béene father of them, and by wicked counſell he brought to paſſe, that there men were woont to inhabite in townes and villages, and where God was wont to be honoured, there all kinde of wilde beaſtes did ſport themſelues, ſo that men ſaide for certaine, that for the ſpace of more then xxx. miles, good profitable corne ground was turned into a chase for wild beasts: this was called the new Forest in Hampshire, wherein be 9. walks, 9. keepers, 2. rangers, a bow bearer, and the Earle of Arundale is lord Warden by inheritance. In building of Castels this king exceeded al his predecessors. Normandy came to him by inheritance, Cenomania he got by force of armes, he made Armorica or Britain obedient vnto him, in England he raigned alone. Scotland and Wales he subdued, he loued peace so well, that a yong wench might without daunger carrie a burden of golde through all places of England safe. John Leyland. Roger of Wind. Theeues so punished, that all people might passe safe.

King William hauing giuen vnto Remigius a Monke of Fiskimee, the Bishoppricke of Dorchester, he nowe misliking that the Bishoppes seat stood in a small Citie, whereas in the same diocesse was the citie of Lincolne, which seemed to be more meete for his seate, he bought lordshippes in the top of the hill, and builded there a Church, and notwithstanding that the Archbishop of Yorke affirmed that place and Citie to bee part of his Diocesse, Remigius not regarding his words proceeded and finished the worke which he had begun, and when he had finished the same, he adorned it with Clarkes that were approued both in learning and manners: he was but small of stature, but stout of hart, brown or darke of colour, but cleare and excellent in workes: hee was once accused of treason to the king, but a certain seruant of his, by iudgment of the fiery sword, purged him, and returned him to the kings fauour. Bishoppricke of Dorcester remooued to Lincolne. Iudgement by the fiery sword.

There was a great water flood through abundance of raine, so that diuers hilles being softened fell, and ouerwhelmed manie villages. About the same time king Wil. had builded the Abbey of Battail in Sussex, on the place where he ouercame Harold, in which place he set Monkes, and dedicated the Church to the holie Trinitie, and to Saint Martin. He also founded Selby Abbey in Yorkeshire, and the Priorie of Saint Nicholas at Excester, and the Abbey of Saint Stephen in the Citie of Caen in Normandy, where he was buried, hee gaue priuiledges to Saint Martins le Grand in London (which Church was founded before the conquest, by Ingelricus and Edwardus his Brother, cousins to king Edwarde the Confessour) hee also gaue to that Colledge all the lande and more, without the Posterne called Crepples gate of London, on either part of the Posterne, that is to saie, from the North corner of the Wall, as the Riuers of the welles there remayning depart the same Poore from the wall, to the running water which entreth the Citie (to wit, through the wall, and so through the Citie, though vnder grounde, to the Riuer of Thamis, and is called Walbroke, of comming through and from the wall.) The description of king Williams seale, with the names of the tessies, (among the which is R. fitz Gilbert prince, Willi. Wellet prince, Arfastus the kings Chancellour, &c.) I omit for breuitie. Water flouded. Battayle Abbey, and other builded. Colledge of S. Martin le grand. Crepples gate of London. The riuer of the wels came down from and by Clarks wel, and so by Oldborne to the Thamis. Walbrooke, of comming through and from the wall of the Citie.

This yeere was a great death of cattell, and a sore distemperature of the aire, whereupon a great mortalitie of men happened, so that manie died first of the feuers, and after of famine. Famine and death of men. Marianus.

In the meane time a deuouring fire spread abroad ouer almost all the principall Cities of Englande, the Church of Saint Paules in London was burnt, with the more part of the Citie, which fire beganne at the entrie of the West London and S. Pauls Church burnt.

gate, and consumed to the East gate. Maurice then Bishop of London, afterward began the foundation of the new Church of S. Paul, a worke that men of that time iudged would neuer haue béene finished, it was to them so wonderfull, king William gaue toward the building of the East end of this church, the choice stones of his Castle, standing nére to the banke of the riuer of Thamis, at the West ende of the Citie; he also gaue to God and Saint Paul, and to Maurice the Bishop and his successors the Castle of Stortford with all the appurtenances, namely the lande which Will. Diacon, and Radulph his brother, held of him, that they maie possesse it for euer.

Stortford Castle in Essex.

After Maurice, Richard his successor did also wonderfully increase the same Church, purchasing of his owne cost the large stréetes about it, where were wont to dwell manie lay people, which ground hee began to compasse about with a strong wall of stone and gates.

King Henry the first gaue to the saide Richard Bishop of London so much of the mote or wall of the Castle on the Thamis side, to the South, as should bee nédefull to make the saide wall of the Church, and so much as should suffice to make a way without the wall on the North side, &c. It should séeme that this Richard inclosed but two sides of the saide Church, or Cemiterie of Saint Paul, to wit, the South and the North sides, for king Edward the second graunted that the Churchyard should be inclosed with a wall, for the murders, and robberies that were committed there. And when the Citizens of London claimed the East part of the Churchyard to be the place of their assembly to the folkemote, and that the great steeple at that time there situate, was to that vse, that all the inhabitants of the City might heare. They claimed also the West side, that they might assemble themselues together with the Lorde of Waynardes Castle, for viewe of their Armour in defence of the Citie. This matter was in the Towre of London referred to Heruins de Stanton and his fellowe Iustices Itenerantes, but I finde not the iudgement of that controuersie, wherefore it is like the Church preuailed, for the wall euen to this time continueth, although nowe on both sides hidden with dwelling houses.

Otho Card. of Ostia Pope Urban II.

The Bishop Stigand of Chichester, Scoland Abbot of S. Augustines at Canterburie, Alsius Abbot of Bath, and Thurstan Abbot of Pozesor, deceased.

This yeere king William remaining in Normandy, being at variance with Philip king of France, continued there a long while, whose patience the saide Philip did (as men said) abuse, with these or like words.

The king of England lieth at Roane, and keepeth his chamber as women doe when they be deliuered of childe, and nourisheth his fatte belly, with which talke king William being offended, saide, when after my childbirth I goe to Church,

Church, I will offer a thousand candles with him, swearing by Gods resurrection and his brightnes, &c. King Williams oth

About the latter end of August, king William in a great displeasure entred France, where he wasted and spoyled all as he passed. King William wasted France.

Last of all he fiered the city of Pewre, & burnt it with our Lady Church, and two Anchors that were inclosed there, who perswaded themselues they ought not to forsake their house and cane in such extremitie, whereat the king reioycing, chéered his men to fed the fire, and came himselfe so nére, that with the heate of his harnesse he got a disease, and to the increase of his sickenes (it was said) his horse leaping ouer a ditch, did burst the inner part of his bellie, with the paine whereof he was sore afflicted, and returned to Roane, where shortlie after he ended his life. King William fell sicke to the death.

This wise noble man feeling himselfe grieuouslie diseased, deferred not to do good vnto himselfe in time to come, & also to many others, wherefore he commaunded all his treasure to bee distributed vnto Churches, poore folkes, and ministers of GOD, and politikelie assigned howe much hee woulde giue vnto euery one, and commanded the same to bee written out by notaries before him.

Amongst the which giftes I finde that hee gaue to the Church of Saint Stephen in Cane, and the Monks there, two mannors in Dorsetshire with their appendantes, one Mannor in Deuonshire, one other in Esser, manie hides of land in Barkeshire, some in Norffolke, and a mansion house in Woodstréete of London, with manie auowsons of Churches, but speciallie to be noted, he gaue his Crowne and ornaments to the same belonging, to the saide Church, which hee before had founded, for the redéeming of the which Crowne and kingly ornaments, king Henry the first, sonne to the said Conquerour, gaue to the saide Church of Saint Stephen, the manno of Bideton in Dorsetshire. King William also sent great summes vnto the Cleargie of Peure, that thereby the Churches which he had burned, might be repaired, Gift of king William to the Abbey of Cane in Normandy.

Of kéeping faith and iustice, of holding the lawe of GOD, and peace, of obseruing the priuiledges of the Churches and Statutes of the fathers, hee admonished all those that were present, and his sayinges worthie to bee remembred, mixed sometime with teares, hee eloquentlie vttered in this sort. Liber vitæ Wil. Conquerour.

Weing laden with many and grieuous sinnes (O Christ) I tremble, and being readie to be taken by and by vnto the terrible examination of God, I am ignorant what I should do, for I haue béene brought vp in the feates of armes, euen from my childhood, I am greatlie polluted with effusion of much blood. I can by no meanes number the euils which I haue done, this 64. yéeres, wherein I haue liued in this troublesome life, for the which I am now constrained without staie to render an accompt to the iust iudge. Words of William the Conquerour before his death. King William 64. yeeres old.

When as my father (of his owne free will going into banishment) committed vnto me the Dukedome of Normandy, I was but a tender boie, that is to wit, of eight yéeres olde, from which time, euen vntill this présent I haue alwayes sustained the weight of armour, and haue gouerned the same Duke- Confession of K. William.

dome almost 56. péeres, in great danger of enemies. Those whome I haue gouerned, haue often laide snares for mee, and wickedly haue brought vnto me domages and great iniuries.

Turchetill my nourisher, and Osberne Herfastus sonne, the Vapifer & Sewer of Normandy, and Earle Gilbert the father of the Countrey with many other necessary for the common wealth, they haue fraudulently slaine, with these things therefore I haue tried the faith of my Countrey: oftentimes in the night for feare of my kinsfolke, I haue béene secretly caried by my vncle Gualter out of the principall chamber, and brought vnto little houses and lurking corners of poore men, lest by those traytors that sought my death I should be found: The Normans if by a good and hard gouernement they bee ruled, they are most valiant, and in doubtfull chinges inuincible, they excell all men, and for their strength, they contend to ouercome all their enemies. Otherwise they teare in pieces and consume one another, for they couet rebellions, they desire seditions, & are ready to al mischiefe, let them therefore be constrained with a strong censure of gouernement, and with the bridle of discipline compelled to walke by the path of iustice, for if at their pleasure, without a yoke they be permitted to go, like a wilde vntamed Asse, they and their prince shall be ouerwhelmed with penurie and reprochfull confusion. And this I haue latelie learned by manie trials, my neighbours and kinsemen that ought by all meanes to defend me against all mortall men, with often conspiring haue risen vp against me.

The Normans valiant if they be wel gouerned, otherwise readie to all mischiefe.

Guy Harold the duke of Burgundy his son by my aunt Adaliza rendred me euill for good, for I receiued him courteously comming out of a strange countrey, and honoured him as a brother, and gaue vnto him Vernoun and Bivnand, not a little part of Normandie, he hath derogated much from me both in his wordes and actes, detesting and declaring me to bee a bastard, to degenerate and to be vnworthie gouernement, and as an enemie hath defamed me, what néede I say more, he hath falsified his faith vnto mee, he hath rebelled against me, and my Péeres, Ranulph of Bayon, and Haimo Teothed, and Nigel of Constantine, and many other more he hath withdrawen from me, and hath constrained them by his wicked persuasions to be periured persons with him, vnmindfull therefore of his homage and fidelitie which he ought vnto me, he went about to take all Normandie from me.

Thus therefore being yet without a beard I was constrained to take by armes against him, and in the plaine at Valesoune to fight against my kinsman and owne seruant.

Then God assisting me, betweene Cane and Argiers I ouercame my enemies, who by Gods appointment being ouerthrowen, I freely possessed my fathers right.

That done I besieged a fort of Bayon, and therin included Guy sore wounded, and fled from the battell, nor I suffered him to depart with them vntill I had expelled him as a common enemie out of Normandy, and obtained all his strong holds. Not long after this an other grieuous aduersitie came vnto me, for my vncles Malgerius Archbishoppe of Roane, and William his brother, by whome whome I had fréelie giuen Arches and the Earledome of Calegij, condemned me as a baſtard, and called Henry the king, and Engelram Earle of Pontine againſt me. Preſently after I had heard of ſuch rumors in Conſtance I entred into the Seyne, many rumors diſſwading me, and ſent before me to Arches a fewe ſouldiers which were more feruenter to fight, and I followed after not with a great army, & beſieged the ſtrong fort, but before I could come vnto the Countries betweene the two Riuers, Sedan and Gerene, my ſouldiours had preuented Earle Engelram hatking to enter the Caſtle, and had ſlaine him manfully fighting, (for he was a moſt ſharpe Souldiour) and had put to flight all his companies.

Thoſe of the Caſtle I bydeled with an harde beſieging, and forced the periured Earle to exile, neither yet permitted I him in all his life to returne to that which hee had loſt. And alſo the frowarde Prelate that was neither deuout to God, nor truſtie vnto mee, I depoſed by decrée of the Pope from his Biſhoppes ſeate, and placed for him Maurice the venerable Ponke, whome God gaue vnto me from the city of Florence in Italie. Henry delighted with his kingly power, & hot with warlike boldneſſe, and greatly pricked forwards with the derogations of mine enemies oftentimes hath endeuoured to treade me vnder as one vnarmed, and by many meanes to feare me, and to appoint vnto me vnlawfull faces. Often with a huge armie he hath entred my land, but hee neuer retoyced of the prie of my ſpoiles, hee oftruentred my lands, but hee neuer merie, nor without ſhame returned home to his owne, manie ſtrong men he brought hither with him, whome for that by my ſworde and my Souldiours (woe worth the griefe,) they were ſlaine, he neuer caried back againe. Heretofore king Henry ouermuch inflamed againſt mee, deuided his huge hoſt into two partes of France, that he might oppreſſe our landes with a double burſting in with violence, for hee himſelfe brought an armie of eight hundred fotemen into Ebroicene Dioceſſe, that they might deſtroy all euen vnto the Riuer of Some, and the other companie hee committed to Odo his brother, and to Raynold of Clarimount, and to two Conſuls Ralfe of Montdeſire, and Widon of Pontine, that by the ſhallow places, they ſhoulde ſoone enter into Normandie, and inuade Drani Calcegi, and the whole Towne of Roane, and ſhould vtterly deſtroie with ſword, fire, and robbing, euen to the Sea.

This therefore I vnderſtanding, on the other ſide, I went forwardes, not ſluggiſhly, againſt the kinges tentes, and repoſed my ſelfe and my Souldiours by the ſhore of Some, and whereſoeuer hee endeuoured to deſtroie my lande with weapons and ſworde, I prepared a reproch, but Robert Earle of Ankeuſe, and Roger Mortimer, with other moſt tried Souldiours I ſent againſt Odo, and his legions, who when almoſt at Caſcus, which is called the dead Sea, they met with the Frenchmen, the companies on both partes being prouided, a terrible battell was fought, and on both partes great effuſion of bloud, for euerie where there were moſt valiaunt fighters, and euen vnto death ignorant to flie, here were the Frenchmen for deſire of gaining, there ſtrike the Normans with a feruent hope of eſcaping, and defending themſelues, selues and their dwelling houses, at the last God helpeth, the Normans banquished, and the French men fledde away. And this battaile they had beyond Some in Winter, before Lent, the eight yéere after the battaile at Valesdonne.

When Wido Earle of Pontine was taken, and Odo with Raynold and others that were lustie in quicknesse of sote were driuen away, Raulphe also the Earle had likewise béene taken vnlesse Roger the Prince of my warre had supported him, for lately he had done homage vnto him.

Therefore in such necessitie he requited him with a faire competent seruice, when he protected him three daies in his Castle, and after permitted him to go safe home to his owne, for this offence I cast Roger out of Normandie, but a little after, being reconciled vnto him, I restored him the rest of his honours, yet the Castle of Mortimere, wherein he kept mine enemie, by right, as I suppose, I toke from him, but I gaue it to William de Warren his kinsemans and lawfull vassall.

Wido Earle of Bayon I held in prison so long as it pleased me, and after two yéeres I receiued againe homage of him, with such honour, that from thencefoorth hee should alwaies be faithfull vnto mee, and should euerie yeere giue vnto me Souldiers seruice, whersoeuer I commanded with an hundred Souldiours.

This done I gaue him great rewardes, and so honoured, sent him away in peace. After this fight ended, by and by as I certainly had tried the rumours, I sent by Ranulph of Oeen those things that had chanced on the farther side of Some vnto the king of France, which thing hee hearing, straightwaies rose vp, and with his horse spédely fledde, and neuer after did lie one night in my land, and thus euen from my childhood with innumerable préssures on euerie side I haue béene letted, but by the grace of God, I haue béene honourably deliuered from them all.

Therefore I was made hatefull to all my neighbors, but God assisting me in whom alwaies I put my trust, I was ouercome of none.

This oftentimes haue the Brytaines, and them of Angeow, and Cenomania grieuously tried.

Godfrey Martell Earle of Anioy, and Conan Prince of the Brytaines, and Robert Frise Prince of Poterell, haue laide waite to entrap me by many subtill inuentions, but God kéeping mee, they were neuer satisfied of their desire.

king William held not England by right of inheritance.

A Royall Diademe that neuer any of my predecessors did beare, I haue gotten, which only heauenly grace, not right of inheritance hath giuen to me. What labours, and perilous conflictes I haue sustained beyond the Seas against those of Excester, Chester, and the Northumbers, the Scottes, the Gaules, Norwegians, and Danes, and against other aduersaries that endeuoured to spoile me of the Realme of England it were hard to declare, in all which the lot of victorie hath come vnto mee: And although manly greedinesse vpon such triumphes reioyceth, yet inwardly a carefull feare pricketh and byteth mee, when I consider that in all those, cruell rathnesse hath raged.

Where-

Wherefore I humbly beseech you, O Priestes, and Ministers of Christ, that you will commend me to the almightie God, with your prayers, that hee will forgiue me my sins, wherewith I am greatly pressed, and by his vnspeakeable mercy, will make me safe amongst his.

My treasures I command to bee giuen to the poore and to Churches, that those thinges that haue bene heaped vp by wicked deedes, mate bee disposed to holy vses of the Saints, for you do remember howe sweetely I haue loued you, and how stronglye against all emulations defended you.

The Church of God, that is do wit, our mother, I neuer violated, but in euerie place where reason required did willingly honour, I haue not solde Ecclesiasticall dignities, simonie alwaies detesting I haue reiected in election of Pastors, I euer searched out the merite of life, and his learning of wisedome, and so neere as I could committed the gouernment of the Church to the most worthie.

And this mate bee faithfully proued in Lanfranke Archbishoppe of Canterburie, this in Anselme Abbot of Becco, this in Gerebert of Fontanell, and in Durand Trearne, and in manie other Doctors of my kingdome, whose famous praises (as I suppose) sounding in the vttermost corners of the earth may be tried. King William commendeth Lanfranke, Anselme, and other Doctors his counsellers.

Such fellowes I chose to talke with, in the fellowship of these I found truth and wisedome, and therefore reioycing I wished euer to enioy their counsels. Nine Abbeies of Monkes, and one of Nunnes, which by my fathers were founded in Normandy, I helping by the assistance of God haue encreased, and with augmentations of many things, which I haue giuen them they are gloriously magnified.

Moreouer, in the time of my gouernment, seuenténe Monasteries of Monkes, and fiue of holy Nonnes are builded, where great seruice vnto God, and much almes to the poore is daily bestowed for the loue of the chiefest king. With such camps Normandy is fenced, and in these fortes let the younglings learne to fight against the deuill, and vices of the flesh. Of these truely either I by Gods inspiration haue béene builder and founder, or els a seruent helper, and well willing intender.

All things also which my Noble men in lands or rentes, haue giuen to God and his Saintes for their spirituall health in Normandie and England I haue courteously granted, and the Charters of the giftes, I haue freely confirmed with princely authoritie against all emulations and troubles.

These studies I haue followed from my first yéres, these I leaue vnto my heires to be kept in all times. In this, my children, follow me continually, that here and for euer before God and men, you may be honoured.

This chiefly, O you (my very bowels) I warne you that you continually cleaue vnto the companie of good and wise men, and bee obedient to their gouernment in all things if you will long gloriously prosper. It is the doctrine of godly wisedome, to discerne good from euill, to kéepe iustice at all times, and with all force to shunne wickednesse, to saue and helpe the sicke and poore, to suppresse and vanquish the proud and vniust, and to bridle them from trou- King William his counsell to his children.

dling of the simple, to frequent deuoutly the holy Church, and aboue all things to loue the worshipping of the diuinity, and to be obedient without any wearinesse day or night, in aduersitie and prosperitie vnto the law of God.

The Dukedome of Normandie before I fought against Harold in the vale Senlac, I granted vnto my sonne Robert, for that he is my first begotten, and hath now receiued homage almost of al the Barons of this country: the honor granted cannot be taken away again, but without doubt I know that truly it wil be a miserable region that shall be subiect to his dominion or gouernment: for he is a prowd and foolish knaue, and to be long punished with cruell fortune.

England not king Williams by inheritance but by conquest

I doe constitute none heire of the realme of England, but commend it vnto the euerlasting creator whose I am, and in whose hands be all things, for I professed not such an honor by right of inheritance, but by the instinct of God, and with much effusion of mans bloud I toke it, and the periured Harold being slaine, or his fauourers driuen away, I made it subiect to my dominion.

The naturall sonnes of the Realme I hated more then right required, the Noble men and vulgare sort I cruelly vexed, manie vniustly I disherited, innumerable, especiallie in the Towne of Yorke, with hunger and sword, I brought to death, for the which the Countrey men beyonde Humber toke in against mee the armie of the king of Sweueland, and slew Robert of Cumin, with a thousand souldiours within Duresme, and other of my Nobles and most approued young Schollers in diuers places. Wherefore moued with an immoderate rage, like a wood lyon, I hasted vnto the Northerne English men, their houses, their corne, and all their prouision and houshold stuffe I commaunded to be burned, and great droues of beastes, and flockes of sheepe euerie where to be killed: therefore I punished with the sword of such horrible hunger the multitude of both sex, and so manie thousandes both of yoong and olde of the most beautifull Countrey (Oh woe worth the griefe) I cruelly killed. The offices therefore of this Realme, that with so manie sinnes I haue obtained, I dare not giue to ante but to God, lest after my death, they be made yet worse by my occasion. William my sonne, who alwaies from his first yeares hath sticked vnto me, and according to his power hath willingly obeied me in all things, I wish in the Spirit of God long to liue in health, and if it be Gods will, happely to flourish in the throne of the Kingdome. These and many such like wordes William spake, and an amazednesse inuaded the standers by, that politikely measured things to come.

After that Henry the yoonger sonne heard nothing to be giuen vnto him of the kingly treasure, lamenting with teares, he saide vnto the king: And what (father) doe you giue vnto me? To whome the king saide, Fiue thousand poundes of siluer out of my treasure I giue vnto thee. To this Henrie saide, What shall I doe with that treasure, if I shall not haue a dwelling place of habitation? Whereunto his father answered, Be of a patient minde my sonne, and comfort thy selfe in God, quietlie suffer that thy elder brother goe before thee. Robert shall haue Normandie, and William England, thou in thy time shalt haue all the honour that I haue gotten, and shalt excell thy brethren in riches and power. These wordes thus spoken, the king fearing

leſt in ſuch a wide Realme ſodaine trouble ſhould ariſe, wrote a Letter vnto Lanfranke Archbiſhop of Canterburie, and being ſigned with his owne ſeale, gaue it vnto William Rufus his ſonne, commanding him preſently to ſaile ouer the Sea into England, and that done, he kiſſed and bleſſed him, and ſpeedilie directed him to take the Crowne, who in ſhort time came to the porte called Whitſand, and there he heard his father to be dead. Henry alſo haſted diligently to receiue the nominated ſumme of money, and to call neceſſary fellowes, in whom he might truſt.

king Williams ſonnes left him and ſought to helpe themſelues to his poſſeſſions.

In the meane time, the Phyſitions, and the kings ſeruantes that kept the languiſhing Prince and the Nobles that came to viſite him, begainne to ſpeake vnto him for the priſoners that hee kept in holde, and humblie beſought him to haue compaſſion vpon them, and to releaſe them. To whome hee ſaide, Morcare the noble Engliſh Earle I haue long kept in priſon, and that vniuſtlie, but it was for feare, leſt by him, if he were at libertie, the Realme of England ſhould bee troubled. Roger alſo of Britole, for that he verie ſtubbornely raged againſt me, and prouoked Raulph of Guadar his ſiſters ſonne and manie others againſt me, I haue ſtraitely kept in priſon, and ſworne, that in my life he ſhould not come forth. So many I call in priſon deſeruing it, through their owne peruerſitie, and ſundrie others mo, for feare of ſedition to come; for this is the rule of righteouſnelle, as the diuine Law by Moſes giuen vnto the gouernours of the world requireth, that the wicked be oppreſſed, leſt they deſtroy the innocent. But now being at the point of death, as I deſire to be ſaued, and abſolued by Gods mercie from my ſinnes, ſo I preſently command al priſon dores to be opened, and all priſoners except my brother, the Biſhop of Bayon, to be releaſed, and for the loue of God to be freelie diſmiſſed, that hee maie haue mercie on me: Notwithſtanding, I haue decreed that they depart out of priſon with this condition, that firſt for more ſecuritie they giue their othe to the officers of the common wealth, that they will by all meanes keepe peace in England and Normandie, and according to their power manfully reſiſt all aduerſaries of the ſame.

All priſoners to be releaſed except his brother Odo.

And when Robert Earle of Morton heard his brother to bee commaunded by the kings ſentence to perpetuall priſon, he greatly ſorrowed: for Herliwinus of Canterbuill tooke vnto wife Herlewine duke Roberts concubine, of whom he begate two ſonnes, Odo and Robert. And Duke William, who afterwards was king, enriched his father in law with manie great honours in Normandie and England, and ſet vp with great poſſeſſions his ſonnes, Raulph whom he had gotten of an other wife, and Odo and Robert, his brothers by the mother: for after that hee had for ſmall offences expelled out of Normandie William ſurnamed Werelenge Earle of Morton, ſonne vnto Earle Magenis, hee gaue the Earledome of Morton vnto his brother Robert Herliwinus ſonne.

Herlem Duke Roberts concubine.

Hugh alſo Biſhoppe of Bayon ſonne of Ralfe Conſule, being dead, he graunted the foreſaid Prelates dignity to his brother Odo, whom afterwards in England he made ruler of the Earledome of Kent. To conclude, him, for his exceſſiuenelle (as before is plainely related) king William tooke in the Ile of Wight, and kept foure yéeres in prison, neyther yet at his death for his insolencie woulde release him. Wherefore the foresaide Earle of Morton greatly sorrowed, and for his brother both by himselfe, and by his friends humblie intreated, and with prayers wearied the languishing king. And when manie had earnestlie desired him for the Bishop of Bayon, the king wearied with the requests of so many, said: I marueil that prudentlie you shew not, whome, or what a man he is, for whome you intreate: do you not aske for such a man, as latelie hath béene in appearance, a contemner of religion, and a crafty stirrer of sedition? haue not I corrected him now these foure yéeres? a Bishoppe, who ought to haue béene a most iust gouernour of the Englishmen, and was in déede the worst oppressor of the people, a Monke, and a destroier of Abbeies. In deliuering a seditious person, you doe euill, and desire a great hurte vnto your selfe, it is plainely séene, that my brother Odo is light, and ambitious, following the desires of the flesh, and vnmeasurable cruelties, and he will neuer bee brought from bawdrie, and hurtfull vanities. And this I haue in manie thinges tryed, therefore I haue imprisoned, not a Bishoppe, but a tyrant, and without doubt the destruction of manie thousandes. These thinges I speake, not of hate as an enimie, but as a father of the Countrey, I prouide for the Christian people, for if hee behaued himselfe chastlie and modestlie as of very right becommeth a Priest and Minister of God, a greater ioie woulde bee at my heart then I can declare. Euerie one promising the amendement of the Bishop. The king said againe, Will I, nill I, your petition must be graunted, for that I beeing dead, sodainelie a vehement mutation shall bee of all thinges. Against my will I graunt, that my Brother bee deliuered out of prison: but knowe you, that by him death, or a great impediment shall bee brought to manie. From Baldricke also the sonne of Nicholas, for that he foolishlie lefte my seruice, and without my licence went into Spayne, I toke all his landes for a punishment; but nowe, for the loue of God, I restore them to him agayne. A better young Souldiour in armes then hee is, I suppose is not to be founde, but hee is prodigall and light, and wandereth to diuers places.

Ile

King William of Odo Bishop of Bayon.

Thus king William, although greéued with ouermuch paines of the inward partes of his bodie, yet effectuallie enioied his wit and liuelie spéech, and vnto all demaunders gaue prompt and profitable counsell of matters of the realme.

To conclude, the Ides of September on a Thursdaie, the Sunne nowe clearely spreading his beames throughout the round world, the king raised vp, hearde the founde of the great bell in the Metropolitane Church, and asking wherefore it sounded, his seruantes answeared, Sir, it ringeth now to prime of our blessed Ladie. Then the king with great deuotion lift vp his eyes vnto heauen, and holding abroad his handes, sayde: I commend my selfe to our blessed Ladie Mary mother of God, that shee by her holie prayers maie reconcile mee to her most deare sonne our Lord Iesus Christ. And these words spoken, hee presentlie yéelded vp the ghost, on the ninth day of September, when he had raigned twentie yeeres, eight monethes, and sixtéene daies, at the age of threescore thzéscoze and foure yéeres. The chiefe Physitions, and others that were pze-sent with them that had kept the king all the night without groaning oz cal-ling, nowe seeing him vpon a sodaine to haue pzesentlie departed, were great-lie astonished, and made almost madde. Furthermoze, the richer sozt of them strayght, taking their Hozses, departed awaie, and hasted homo to defend their owne. The inferiour sozte, oz clientes also, seeing their Maister in such sozt to haue departed, snatched awaie the armour, vessell, apparrell, linnen, and all the kinges houshold stuffe, leauing the kings dead bodie almost bare in the flooze of his house, fledde awaie. Beholde, I pzaie you, what woozldlie fidelitie is, e-uerie one as a Kite snatched what hee coulde of his stuffe, and pzesentlie fledde awaie with their pzaie. Impietie therefoze (Justice falling downe) impudent-lie commeth forth, and exerciseth rauenous pillage vpon the reuenger of rau-enous pillers.

The kings dead body spoiled and forsaken.

The fame of the kinges death flewe abzoad, with swift wings, and wyde and bzoad bzought sore oz feare to the heartes of the hearers. For the death of king William the verie selfe same daie that hee died at Roane, was vnto his kinred in Rome, and Calabzia also shewed, as afterwards by them in Normandie it was truelie related. Truelie the euill spirite greatlie reioiced, when hée sawe the seruants that vehemently gaped to snatch and take away al by death of the iudge to be frée. O woozldly pompe! how contemptible art thou, because thou art euer vaine and slippery: Rightly thou maiest be compared to a bub-ble in the water, that in a moment so pzowdelie settest vp thy selfe, and sodain-lie thou shalt be bzought into nothing. Behold the mightie pzince vpon whome aboue a hundzed thousande Souldiours willinglie waited, and whome manie Countries with trembling feared, nowe is in his owne house by his owne ser-uauntes shamefullie spoyled, and from the pzime, vnto the third houre left vp-on the bare ground. For the citizens of Roane hearing of the death of the pzince were greatlie feared, and almost all like dzunken men, were so troubled, as if they had séene a multitude of enimies to be néere vnto the Citie, euerie one de-parted from the place where hée was, and asked counsaile of his wife, oz his companions that hee mette, what were best to doe. Euerie one either carr-yed oz decreede to carrie their goods from one place to another, and with feare hid them, least they shoulde bee founde. At the last, the religious men, Pziestes, and Monkes, gathering their powers and senses together, oz dayp-ned a pzocession, and decentlie went forwarde vnto Saint Geruasius Church: and according vnto the custome of holy chzistians commended the soule of the king to God.

Example of woozldly pomp.

Then William the Archbyshop commanded that his body shoulde bee carri-ed to Caine, and there in the Church of Saint Stephen the first Martyze, which hee had builded should bee buried. But his bzethzen and kinsmen were nowe gone from him, and all his seruants had wickedly left him as a barbarous per-son, wherefoze there was not one of the kings knights to be found that would take care for the exequies of his bodie.

king William's body forsa-ken of all his pzofessed friends and followers.

Then Harluinus a certaine countrey knight, being pzicked with his owne good nature, manfullie, for the loue of God, and honour of his countrey, toke vpon vpon him carefullie to see the kinges funerall solemnized. Therefore the dressers with ointmentes, and carriers of the dead bodie, and a Wagon hee hyred at his owne proper costes, they carried the dead bodie of the king to the hauen of Some, and putting it in a Shippe, by Sea and late lande, brought it vnto Cane. Then the Lord Guilebert Abbot, with the couent of Monkes reuerentlie came forth to méete the corpes: to whome, weeping, and praying, cleaued the whole multitude of the Cleargy and laity: but presentlie peruerse fortune powred out vpon al together a great terrour, for straightwaies a terrible fire burst out of a certaine house, and cal by hugs flames, and hurtfullie inuaded a great part of the towne of Cane. All the Clearkes therefore, with the laie people run to represse the fire, only the Monks ended the office begun, and singing, brought the kings bodie to the Abbey Church.

The Towne of Cane fiered by casualtie.

To conclude, to bury this great duke and father of the country were gathered together al the bishops and abbots of Normandy, of the which was William Archbyshop of Roane, and manie other Byshops and Abbots which were long to name.

All they came together at the solemne funerall of the famous king, and buryed him in the Presbytorie betweene the quiere and the Altar. The masse ended, when the Coffin was nowe set in the earth, but the bodie yet remained on the Bere: The great Guillebert Byshoppe of Ebroicen, went vp into the pulpet, and eloquentlie pronounced a long Sermon of the magnificence of the dead king that he valiantly had enlarged the bounds of Normandy, and hadde tolled his Countrey more then all his predecessours, peace and iustice he kept throughout all his dominions. Theeues and robbers hee mankullie chastised, with the rule of righteousnesse, and the secular Priestes, Monkes, and vnarmed people hee stronglie fenced with the Swoorde of vertue. The Sermon ended, and for pitie manie weeping and protesting his woords to be true, he required the people with this addition, for that no man mortall can liue in this life without sinne, in the loue of GOD wee praie you all for the dead Prince, that you will make intercession for him vnto Almighty God, and if he haue offended anie you, charitablie to forgiue him.

Then Anselme fitz Arthur rising from the companie, with an high voyce vttered such a plaint. This ground whereon you stande, was the floore of my fathers house, the which that man for whome you doe make intercession, when as yet he was Duke of Normandy, violentlie toke from my father, and all right denied, mightilie founded this house. This ground therefore I challenge, and openlie reclaime, and in Gods behalfe I forbid that the bodie of the taker awaie by violence be couered in my earth, neither yet shall he be buried in my inheritance.

Buriall forbidden to the dead king.

After that the Bishops and other noble men heard this, and vnderstood by his friendes, who testified him to haue saide true, they sent for the man, and all violence set aparte, mollified him with gentle praiers, and made peace with him: for, for the place of his buriall, they presently gaue him threescore shillings, and for the rest of the ground which hee claimed, they promised him an equiualent price, and so in a small time, for the saluation of their speciall friende whome they they loued, they made an agreement, and (by the consent of Henry his sonne) 100. pound of siluer was giuen. Further, when the bodie should bee put in the tombe or coffin, and was violently pressed, that the same, through the follie of the rough masons, was shorte, and streight; his fat belly (not bowelled) cracked, and an intollerable stinke filled the standers about, and the rest of the communaltie, so that the smoake of frankencense, and other gummes or spices, copiously ascending from the censars preuailed not to exclude the worse smell: wherefore the Priestes hasted to finish the buriall, and presentlie with feare to get them to their celles. And thus haue I truely shewed the fall of the Duke, and not a vaine Comedie, to make men laugh: which also sufficeth to prooue, that the bodie of king William could not bee found vncorrupt more then foure hundred yeeres after the same was buried (as some haue fabuled) neither yet his bodie to be of eight fote length: for then, such as wrote of his life, raigne, and description, would so haue noted, who all agree in one, that he was a man of meane stature, bigge bellied, &c. And last of all, for a full confuting of the saide fable, when his restlesse bones, which so hardly had obtained entombing (as ye haue heard) did afterward as vnluckely againe lose it in the yeare of Christ, 1562. to wit, when Chastillion, conducting the remnant of those that escaped at the battell of Dreux, tooke the Citie of Cane, certaine sauage souldiours, as well English men as others accompanied with foure Captaines, did beate downe, and vtterly deface the noble tombe and monument of that renowmed Conquerour, and victorious king, pulling out all his bones, which some of them spitefullie threwe away (when they could not finde the treasure they falsely surmised had beene laide vppe there) and others, to wit the English snatched, euery one to haue some piece of them, not making anie wonder of them, as they would haue done, if the same had exceeded the length and bignesse of mens bones of latter yeares, where as in deed, there was no such thing noted in them, as I haue beene certainly informed by English men of good credite, who were present eie witnesses at the spoile of of that monument and bones, and brought some part of them into this realme. Theuit maketh mention of this matter in his vniuersall Cosmographie writing of Cane.

Now to speake of the issue of this noble Conquerour, whereof I haue before, partly touched: He had by Maild his wife daughter to Baldwine Earle of Flaunders, Robert surnamed Curthos, as some write, but as saieth Cornelius Martin, and Peter Balthazar, in their booke of the Earles of Holland, Courtecaise, to wit in English, short thighe, who after his father was Duke of Normandie. Richard that died young in the new forrest, as he was a hunting in the place where his father had ouerthrowne Churches, and Townes to make harbour for beastes, hee was buried at Winchester, on whose monument, hee was written Duke of Bologne. William surnamed Le Rouse, or the Red, who succeeded in the kingdome of England. And Henry, vnto whome he gaue 5000. pound of siluer out of his treasurie (as yee haue heard before.) He had daughters, Cicilie Abbesse of Cane. Constance maried to Allan Earle of Brytaine. Adela wife to Stephen Earle of Bloyse. Margaret William the Redde fetched from Winchester the treasure, which all the yeares of his fathers raigne had beene gathered, and gaue the golde to the Monasteries, and to the parish Churches, euerie one fiue shillings of siluer, and to euerie borough towne he gaue an hundred pounds to bee dealt to the poore. He also adorned a memorial of his father with a great heape of siluer, and golde, and pretious stones.

Anno reg. 1.

William le Rouse or Redde the third sonne of William Conquerour, beganne his raigne the ninth daie of September, in the yeere of our Lorde 1087. and was crowned at Westminster by Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterburie, the first daie of October. He was of person a square man, red coloured, his hayre somewhat yellowe, his fatehead foure square like a windowe, his eies not one like the other, not of anie great stature, though somewhat big bellied, he was variable, inconstant, covetous and cruell, hee burdened his people with unreasonable taxes, pilled the rich, and oppressed the poore, & that he thus got, he prodigally spent in great banquetting and sumptuous apparell, for he would neither eate, drinke, or weare any thing, but that it cost unmeasurable deere. As for example it was in those daies written (and for vs now to be noted) that in a morning his Chamberlaine bringing him a new paire of hosen, hee demanding what they cost, and the chamberlaine answering fiue shillings, the king being wroth, said, Away beggar that thou art, are those mee hose for a king to weare, bring me a paire of a marke, or thou shalt sore repent it; then his chamberlaine fetcht an other paire that were much worse then the first (for a better paire could not be got) and said they cost a marke, wherewith K. William was well pleased. Thus farre haue I noted the saying of K. William, because it importeth the simplicitie of apparell in those daies died, so farre different from the excesse of this present time.

When Lanfranke was dead, king William kepte in his owne handes the Churches and Monaſteries of England, after their Paſtours were dead, making great ſpoile, and letting them out to farme to ſuch as woulde giue moſt for them. Mathew Paris. G. Lilly.

This king William, ſo long as Lanfranke liued, ſeemed to abhorre all kinde of vice, ſo that hee was accounted a mirrour of kings: But now when Lanfranke was dead, he firſt ſhewed himſelfe for a while variable, as it were, betwixt vice and vertue, and after, to wit, toward his later daies, al indeuor of vertue waxing colde, the heate of vices increaſed in him, he ſet his mind to exacting: and one Ranulph a Clearke (or Secretarie) a man of baſe kinred, by his faire tongue and ſubtill wit, being come to promotion, did pricke forward his couetous heart. This Ranulph was a poller of the rich, and an vndoer of the poore, a confiſcatour of other mens inheritances, an inſtill lawyer, the king woulde often laugh at him, and ſay, he was a man alone, which could compaſſe his matters ſo well to pleaſe his Maiſter, he being the Authour. Churches were ſet to ſale, ſo ſoone as the Incumbent was dead: for ſtraightway this Ranulph was ſent to take inuentory of al that was found, and the ſame to be confiſcate to the kings vſe, and inquirie was then made for one meete to be ſet in the place of the Byſhop, Abbot, or other deceaſed, not for their worthineſſe, but for their money that woulde giue moſt, who at the length ſhoulde haue that promotion naked and bare, notwithſtanding they paied deare for it. There was no man rich but Collectors of money, no clearks but men of law, not of conſcience, no Prieſts but Farmours. What crime ſoeuer any man had committed, ſo ſoone as he did appeale for the kings aduantage by accuſing other, he was heard, yea the rope was taken from their neckes. The courtiers deuoured the ſubſtance of the huſbandmen their tenants: Then the laying out of haire, and the ſuperfluitie of garments was found, the tendernelle of the body, and wreſtling with women, nice going, with diſſolute behauiour was in vre, there followed the court a number of effeminat perſons, and great companies of ruffians, whereby the ſame court was not a place of maieſty, but a brothell houſe of vnlawfull things, ſuch as ought to be aboliſhed. Abuſes of this kings time.

This was a token of great inſolencie in the king, that when the Iewes at London came to him, and brought him preſents, he encouraged them to fight againſt the Chriſtians, ſwearing by Lukes face, that if they did ouercome, he would become one of their ſecte. king Williams ode, and vnfaithfulneſſe.

On the eleuenth day of the moneth of Auguſt, about three of the clocke in the afternoone, a great earthquake made all England afraide, with a terrible wonder, ſo that all buildings did (as it were) leape vpwards, and immediatly ſet themſelues in their olde place: after the which there followed great ſcarcitie of fruite, and late harueſt of corne, ſo that the ſame was ſcarcely inned at S. An. reg. 3. 1090 King William being desirous to take Normandie from his eldest brother Robert, and to bring it vnder his dominion, he first bought the castle of S. Valery of one Walter, and the castle of Albemarle of Odo, and put into them men of armes to waste Normandy. Which thing being knowne to duke Robert, he sendeth messengers vnto his soueraigne Philip king of France, requiring him to come to aide him in Normandie, who indeede shortely after brought a great power, and besieged one of the forenamed Castles, wherein king William had placed a number of men of armes. Of which siege when king William vnderstoode, hee sent ouer no small portion of money vnto king Philip, requiring him to withdrawe his siege, who receiuing the money returned home.

The winning of Glamorgan and Morgannoke out of the Welch mens hands.

About this time, one Iustinus sonne to Gurguntus Earle of Glamorgan, and Morgannoke, refusing to obey Rhesus, sonne to Theodore Prince of South Wales, sent Aeneas sonne to Gedinorus, sometime Lorde of Demetis into England, to take muster of souldiers, and there receiued a great army, vnder the conduct of one Robert Fitzhamon, and ioyning with other rabbles out of Went and Brecinia, met with Rhesus in Blacke hill, and there slewe him, and so paying the Englishmen their wages, discharged them. But they taking regarde vnto the goodnesse of the soile, and the great variance which was then amongst the Welchmen, as in former time the Saxons had done, they turned their force of armes against those which had intertained them, and soone displaced them wholy of all the champion, and the best of the Countrey, which Robert Fitzhamon diuided amongst twelue knights which he brought with him, reserning the better part to himselfe, who building there certaine Castles, and ioyning their power together, defended their Farmes and Lordships which they had taken and possessed, whose heires peaceably enioy the same vnto this daie: but Iustinus scarcely reserued to himselfe and his, the hillie Countrey. The names of the twelue knights were these:

1 William Lowdon.
2 Richard Granuille.
3 Paganus Turberuille.
4 Robert Saintquintine.
5 Richard Siward.
6 Gilbert Vmfreuill.

12 William Easterling: now for shortnesse called Stradling.

Thus was the Lordshippe of Glamorgan and Morgannoke won out of the Welchmens handes, which Lordshippe contained in length from Rimbridge on the East side, to Pallekinan in the West side seauen and twentie miles. The breadth from the hauen of Aberthawe on the South side,

In this province are neere vpon a riuer of the same name Pontfaine, that is to say, Stonebridge, sometimes called Cowbridge, Lantwid, Wenny, Winwid, townes, and castles, besides Caer Phili, a most ancient Castle and fortresse, which by report was erected by the Romans, and Caerdid the principall town of the shire, standing vpon the riuer Tafe, Englishmen terme it Cardid or Cardike. Also, within the body of the said Lordship were eighténe Castles, fiue and thirtie knights fées & a halfe, that held of the same Lordship by knights seruice, besides a great number of freeholders. Also, the saide Lordship being a Lordship Marcher, or a Lordship Royall, and holden of no other Lordship, the Lordes thereof, euer since the winning of the same owing their obedience only to the Crowne, haue vsed therein Iura regalia with the triall of all actions, as well reall as personall, and pleas of the crowne, with authoritie to pardon all offences, treason only excepted. Humfrey Llhuyd.

Now to returne to king William: he in this meane time making warre against his brother Robert duke of Normandie, tooke the Castles of Walerike and of Albemarle, then sending his souldiours into his brothers country, he began to spoile and robbe. But through the diligence of friends, agréement was made betweene them, vpon condition, that Robert his brother should giue vp into the kings hands, the castles that he had gotten of him, to wit, the countie of Owe, the Abbey of Fescampe, the Abbey of S. Michaels Mount, and Hereborugh, &c. And those Castles which were reuolted from the duke in the county of Maine, with the Castles which stode against him in Normandie, the king should subdue them, and restore them to the duke, and all the lands in England pertaining to the Normans, which for their loyalty to the Duke they had lost, he should restore to the Normans. Also he should giue to the duke so much land in England as was couenanted betweene them. Moreouer, it was agreed, that if the Duke died without issue male, the king should be his heyre: and in like case, if the king died without lawfull issue male, the Duke should be his heyre. Which couenants were confirmed by the othe of twelue Barons on the kings part, and as many on the Dukes part. king William inuadeth Robert his elder brother.

In the meane time Henry yonger brother to the king and Duke, with a power of men of armes entred Saint Michaels Mount, and walled the kings landes, taking prisoners, and robbing other. Wherefore the king and Duke with an army besieged mount Saint Michael, all the Lent season, oft times fighting with their brother Henry, where they lefte both men and horses, but preuailed little. The king on a time comming out of his pauilion, and séeing the enemies a far off riding in a brauerie, he alone rode against them, and set vpon them, thinking that no man durst bee so bolde as to withstand him: but straight way his horse was slaine vnder him, and himselfe drawne by the one foote: and when the knight that had ouerthrowne him, tooke his swoorde in his hand to smite him, he cried out, Hold thy hand knaue, I am the king of England. The whole company of men of armes knowing his voice, straight way they reuerently tooke him vp from the ground, and brought him another horse: Henry inuadeth his elder brother.

and hee loking for no ſtirrope, ſprang vpon the horſe backe, and with an angrie countenance beholding all that ſtode about him, ſaid: Who was it that ouerthrew mee? And the knight which had done the déede, ſaide: I not thinking that you had bæne the king, but a knight, did ouerthrow you. With the which anſwere the king being pleaſed, ſwore by Lukes face, thou ſhalt be my knight, and ſhalt bee written in my white Booke, with the reward of a worthy knight.

Malcolme did homage to king William.

Malcolme king of Scottes, with a great armie inuaded Northumberland, meaning if he had ſped well to proceéde further, but he was diſappointed in his firſt attempt, notwithſtanding he returned with great praies. Whereof when king William vnderſtode, hee returned into England with his brother Robert, and ſhortly after with no ſmall nauy and armie of horſemen and footmen, he went into Scotland to inuade king Malcolme, but before he could come thither, almoſt all his nauy was drowned, and many of his horſemen periſhed through hunger and colde. King Malcolme mette with king William, which when Duke Robert beheelde, he called to him Clito Edgar, whome king William had expulſed out of Normandie: vpon truſt of whoſe helpe, he made peace betwirt the two kings, with condition, &c. Duke Robert alſo pacified the kings wrath againſt Clito Edgar.

Tempeſt of lightning at Winchelſcombe.

On the nineténth of October, a vehement ſtroke of lightning, ſhaking the ſteéple of the Abbey at Winchelſcombe, made a great hole in ẏ ſtone worke thereof neére to the toppe, rent one of the beames in the church, and caſt downe to the ground the head of the Crucifix with great violence, and brake the right legge of the ſame Crucifix, the Image of our Lady alſo, that ſtood by the croſſe, being ſhaken with the blowe, fell to the ground. Alſo a great ſmoake afterwards with a maruellous filthie ſmell, filled all the church, which continued long after: although the Monkes with holy water, and incenſes, went about the houſes of the Monaſterie, ſinging Pſalmes, &c.

Tempeſt of wind at London, more then fiue hundreth houſes blowne downe.

And on the ſeuenteenth day of November, a mighty tempeſt of wind out of the South weſt, beat downe in London fiue hundred and ſix houſes, and ſhaked the Churches, eſpecially the Church of Saint Mary Bowe in Cheape, when the winde brake in with ſuch a vehement force, that two men were therewith ſlaine in the Church, and the roofe being raiſed with the beames thereof were carried in the ayre a great while, and at the laſt fiue of the ſaide beames were driuen with their fal ſo faſt into the ground, that there appeared of ſome of them the ſeuenth, and of ſome the eight part, to wit, but fourtéene foote aboue the ground: which beames or rafters were ſeauen and twentie or eight and twentie foote long, which was a wonderfull thing to ſée them ſo pierce the ground (not paued then with ſtone) and there to ſtand in ſuch order, as the workemen had placed them on the Church, vntill ſuch time as they were cut euen by the ground. The Tower of London was alſo broken, &c. When king William had repaired ſuch Caſtles as the Scottes had impayred, and builded the newe Caſtle vpon Tine, hee returning forth of Northumberland, came through Mercia into Weſſex, and kept the Duke with him till Chriſtmas, but he would not performe anie promiſe made with him, which the Duke taking grieuouſly paſſed

This yeere deceased Wido the 42. Abbot of S. Augustines by Canterburie. W. Thorne.
After whose buriall, the monkes of S. Augustines went to king William to obtaine licence to chose a new Abbot, which request was not onely denied them by the king, but he also charged them vpon a great paine, not to elect any, saying, that he would holde in his hands, all the Spirituall liuings in the whole realme, and would dispose of them at his pleasure: so the Monkes of Saint Austines returned frustrate of all hope beauily. Now it happened at the same time, there was in that Monasterie a certaine Monke, in religion young, but graue in discretion, a Norman borne, and king Williams kinsman, by name called Hugh de Floriaco. This Hugh hauing beene a valiant souldier, had long serued king William the elder, and the saide king William Rufus, as well in Normandie, as in England. Hugh, as yet by profession a souldiour, on a certaine time comming to Canterbury with king William Rufus, vpon deuotion did visit S. Augustines church, where by Gods spectall grace, rauished with the A souldiour be-loue of God, and delighting in the chaste life of the Monkes, he would not goe came a monke, out of the limits of the monastery before he had procured to be made a monke and was Ab-and brother of the said monastery. Which being granted, the said Hugh went bot of Saint into Normandie, distributed his goods vnto his kinsemen, and to the poore, be- Augustines.
cause he had no wife nor childe, and returned vnto the monastery, and put on the monkish habite, and so remained a Monke. The Abbot Wido being dead (as it is said) at the last it was decreed that two circumspect Monkes, together with the said Hugh, who had scarce continued one yeere of probation should bee sent to the king to procure his fauour by praier or price, that he would graunt them licence to elect an Abbot. When these presented themselues vnto the kings sight, and saw his cousin, who in time before had serued him in the bauerie of a souldier, to be now cloathed in habite of a monke, he was so dismaied in minde, that gushing out with teares he said, I do grant you this cousin of mine to be your Abbot, and at your petition I doe giue him the gouernement of the Abbey of Saint Augustine, neither do I permit you to chose any other, whom, vnlesse you doe presently receiue, I will shortly burne your Abbey to ashes. Then the Monkes seeing no remedy, submitted themselues to the kings will in the premisses. But the foresaid Hugh long time refused the honour, saying, that he was as well vnworthy, as insufficient, because he was a man in a manner vnlettered, and one that had verie little skill, aswel in religion, as in ecclesiasticall ordinances, but the king and the monkes forced him to accept the honour offered, neither did the king suffer him to depart from the Court before he were consecrated Abbot, which was done in the kings Chappell at Westminster, by Maurice Bishop of London. This Abbot did manie laudable Annotg. S.
actes to the great commodity of that church. King William moued warres against the Welchmen, but preuailed not, for he lost many of his best knights, and much cattell, as well at this time, as at other.

1092 Iohn Bishoppe of Welles a Turon borne, by consent of king William for a great summe of money translated his bishops sea to Bathe.

This yeere a noble man of the Normans blond named Picot, vicecomes or sherife, at ỹ requeſt of Hugolin his wife, founded a church to the honor of God & S. Giles, neere vnto the caſtle of Cambridge, but afterward, to wit, in an. 1102, the Chanons were remoued to Barnwell, by Paine Peuerell.

The Towne of Cambridge toke name of a fair large bridge, made ouer the riuer Grant there running, and ſo named Grantbridge (corruptly Cambridge:) it encreaſed by meane of this bridge, which was the ruine of Grantceſter, ſometimes a famous citie, ſituate little more then a mile from Grantbridge.

Caſtle at Grantbridge builded in the time of William Conqueror.

The Caſtle was builded in the firſt yeere of William Conquerour, as mate appeare by the deſcription in Doomes day Booke in the Exchequer, which hath thus. The borough of Grantbridge defended it ſelfe for one hundred in the time of Edward the K. In this borough haue bin, and yet are 8. wards: in the firſt ward are 54. manſions, of them 12. be waſted: In this firſt warde Allan hath 5. burgeſſes that pay nothing, ỹ earle Morton hath 3. manſions of the land of Lodichel: and there be 3. burgeſſes, which in the time of Edward the K. paid 5. ſhillings and 8. pence halfepeny, at this day they pay nothing: Ralfe of Want hath 2. burgeſſes that pay nothing. Roger ſeruant to Biſhop Remigius hath 3. burgeſſes that paie nothing, Erchingot hath 1. burges that paieth nothing: this ward was accounted in the daies of king Ed. for 2 wards, but for the caſtle 27. hooſes were thrown down. In the ſecond ward were 48. manſions in the time of king Ed. whereof 2. be waſted, of them 13 yéeld nothing, the other 32. pay all cuſtomes, Earle Allan hath of them 5. burgeſſes that yéeld nothing, and 9. remaine in the hands of the Engliſhmen. In the third ward were 41. manſions, of them 11. be waſted, the other 30. pay all cuſtomes. In the fourth ward were 45. manſions, of them 24. be waſted, the other 21. pay all cuſtomes. In the fift ward were fifti manſions, one of them is waſted, all the reſt pay the cuſtomes. In the ſeuenth ward were 37. manſions, 3. of thoſe 37. Frenchmen haue, and pay nothing. In the eight ward were 37. manſions, a Prieſt holdeth one & paieth nothing, 3. are waſted. In the ninth ward were 32 manſions. In the tenth ward were 29. manſions, 7. of them are waſted, but yet they defend themſelues. The cuſtomes payable for this towne were 7. pounds by yéere. And for Landgable 7. pounds, and 2. ores and 2. pence. The burgeſſes in the time of king Edward lent the ſheriffe their carts thrife in the yéere: now they are demaunded nine times. They found neither boates nor wagons in the time of K. Edward, which they doe nowe by cuſtome ſet vpon them. They claime of the Earle Picot a common paſture, which he hath taken from them. The ſame Picote hath made there three Milles, which taketh away the paſture, and deſtroieth many houſes, and one Mill of the Abbot of Ely, and an other of the Earle Allan, the Milles yéelde nine poundes the yéere. The ſame Earle Picot hath of the heriot of the Lagemans ſeuen pounds, and one palfrey, and one knights armor. Alurike Godricſon when he was ſheriffe had of one of them twenty ſhillings for a heriot. Thus much Doomes day for Grantbridge, whereof more ſhall be ſaid in place conuenient.

The Princes of the pilgrimes with their armies toke their iourney toward Jerusalem, besieged it, and toke it on the tenth of July, placing there a king, and a patriarke, and afterward fought with the Souldan of Egypt (who besieged them in Jerusalem) and ouercame him. An. reg. 12. 1099 The Christians wan Jerusalem.

King William being returned out of Normandie into England, kept his feast of Whitsontide very royally at Westminster, in the new hall, which hee had lately caused there to be builded, the length whereof was 270. fot, and 74. fot in breadth: and when he heard men say that the hall was to bigge, and too great, he answered and saide, This Hall is not bigge ynough by the one halfe, and is but a bed chamber, in comparison of that I minde to make. A diligent searcher might yet finde out the foundation of the Hall, which he had purposed to build, stretching from the Riuer of Thames, euen vnto the common high way. As writeth H. Huntington, he chalenged the inuestiture of Prelates, he pilled and shaued the people, with tribute, especially to spend about the Towre of London, and the great Hall at Westminster. King William hauing transferred into his treasurie three hundreth pounds by yeere forth of the Bishopricke of Durham, and fiue moneths being past of the fourth yeere, from the death of William Bishop of Durham, gaue the Bishopricke to Ranulph, who for certaine excellent parts about the king was named the kings Chaplain, but some haue written that he gaue the king a thousand pound for that Bishopricke. This Ranulph was first familiar with Maurice bishop of London, but falling at variance, because the Deanry was taken away from him, he went to the king in hope of a higher place, in which point his hope was not deceiued, for being admitted, and hauing a good wit and readie tongue, in short time he obtained to be preferred afore all other estates of England, who being called to be Procurator or Chancellor of the whole realme, did manie times behaue himselfe so prowdly, abusing his authoritie, that he little estéemed to offende many, who laboured with continuall accusations to cloud the cléere minde of the King toward him, whereof when they failed with vaine labour, they imagined how to haue killed him. For which cause, one Gerald, armed with audacitie and deceit of other, taking a boate with a fewe persons, met with the Chaplaine Ranulph at London, humbly requesting him that he would make spéed vnto his Master Mauricius Bishop of London, lying very sicke at his house vpon the riuer of Thames, who being almost readie to depart the world, greatly desired to speake with him. Ranulph suspecting nothing, entred the boat with a fewe of his companie, which boat Gerald with a straight course directed in the middle of the streame vnto the sea: and when the Chaplaine demanded why they rowed so long, and did not turne to the shore, they fayned that the port was further off, where they should haue conuenient place to land.

thor in the midst of the floude, which, as it seemed, awaited for his comming, did presentlie suspect the deuise of their deceit. And beeing transported vnto the suspected Shippe, in the which was harboured a great number of armed men, perceyuing no hope to escape, hee cast the Ring which he ware on his finger into the Sea: and his Secretarie did throwe his Seals into the midst of the floude, lest throughe those Seales the state of thinges might bee disturbed by counterfeyte processes, and Writtes set foorth by the deceyuing enemie. After this his men are set ouer, beeing first bounde with an othe, not to disclose anie thing of the stealing awaie of their Maister.

Nowe the Shippe leauing the Riuer, with hoised sailes, entred the deepe Sea, directing their course towardes the South, and Ranulph sitting in the foreparte of the Shippe. There arose a contention among the shipmen for the manner of his death: and two are chosen forth, either to heaue him into the sea, or to knocke out his braines, who shoulde for rewarde obtaine those garments therewith hee was clothed: of which persons, when the one woulde haue his roabe or vppermost garment, and the other woulde also possesse the same, this contention protracted time of his death. At length there sodaynelie arose a fierce winde from the South, which troubled the Sea from the verie bottome, and the Heauens were couered with darkenesse. Which tempest so tossed the Boate hither and thither, that they coulde neyther goe forwarde, nor returne backe againe to land. And when the Mast and Cables were broken, the ship was not onelie carried on the water, but she also carried in her the water, nothing being more certaine then death to them all, which they looked for, onelie such was the course of the Sea, that the shippe was returning to the place from whence she came, and yet the waues beating her backe, the murderers, a new determine for the death of the chaplaine, lest he escaping shoulde reuenge such iniurie.

But one which was next to Gerald in the shippe, abhorring this wickednes, and beeing neere to the Chaplaine with sorowfull repetition sayde, But alas, Ranulph, thou shalt nowe be murdered, but if thou wilt pardon me this wicked conspiracie, I will stand by thee to thy defence, as a companion of thy life or death. Whereunto he (as he was alwaies bold spirited) with great noise calling vpon him, saide: What dost thou thinke Gerald? What dost thou request of vs? Thou art my man, thou owest faith to me, call backe thy mind from the wicked deede thou intendest, demaunde what thou wilt, for I am he that giue more then thou canst demaunde. Then Gerald, not so much allured by words, as feared with the authoritie of the man, did consent, and bringing him out of the shippe, nowe beaten to the shore, did procure him honourable furniture, at his owne house. But not trusting the former promises, he procured his owne safetie by banishment into perpetuall exile. Ranulph therefore calling knights together, is brought to London with manie armed men, and a great noise of people, to the astonishment of all men, supposing him to haue beene slaine, he as then was sodainly reuiued, and set againe as executor of the kings affaires, and receiued the Bishoprieke of Durham, being consecrated in the Church of Saint Paul in London.

King William on the morrowe after Lammas daie, hunting in the newe Forrest of Hampshire, in a place called Chorengham, where since a Chappell was builded, sir Walter Tirell shoting at a deere, vnawares hit the king in the breast, that he fell downe stark dead, and never spake word. His men (especially that knight) got them away, but some came back again, & laid his body vpon a Colliars cart, which one sele leane beast did draw vnto the Citie of Winchester, where he was buried on the morrow after his death, at whose buriall, men could not weepe for ioie. king Williams slayne.

This king was taken out of this world in the midst of his vnrighteousnesse, who being wicked to his owne people, and to strangers, was most wicked to himselfe. The countries about him he prouoked with wars, and England was so miserably oppressed vnder him, that it could not recouer, for he and his traine spoiled and subuerted all thinges. William Rufus troubled the lands about him with wars, and oppressed his owne people.

He died in the yeere of Christ, 1100. and in the 13. yeere of his raigne, on the second day of August, when he had raigned 12. yeres 11. moneths, lacking eight daies, and was buried at Winchester, in the Cathedrall Church or Monasterie of Saint Swithen, vnder a plaine flatte marble stone, before the lectorne in the quere, but long since his bones were translated in a Coffer and layde with king Knutes bones. He gaue vnto the Monkes called de charitate in Southwarke, the great newe Church of Saint Sauiour of Bermondes-eye, which which he had caused to be builded for them, and also his mannor of Bermondsey it selfe, with all the pertinances, and confirmed vnto them all whatsoeuer Alwyn Child their first founder, Robert Bythop of Lincolne, (who also gaue to them the towne of Charleton) or other had giuen vnto them.

He also of an olde Monasterie of Monkes in the Citie of Yorke, founded an Hospitall, and dedicated it to Saint Peter, for the sustentation and finding of the poore as well men as women, which Hospitall was since greatly augmented by king Stephen, and by him dedicated to Saint Leonard.

Henry Beauclerke.

Annoreg. 1. Io. Rouse.

HEnry, the yongest sonne of William Conquerour, borne in England, at a place called Selby in Lincolneshire, brother to William Rufus, and the first of that name, for his learning called Beauclerke, brought vp in the studie of the liberall artes at Cambridge, chiefly through the trauaile of Henry Newborow Earle of Warwike, (who appeased all debates of that time to the contrarie) obtained the dominion ouer this Realme of England, and began his raigne the second of August, in the yere of our Lord 1100. and was crowned at Westminster on the first day of August, by Maurice Bythoppe of London, because at that time Anselme Archbishop of Canterburie, was by persecution of William Rufus exiled.

Gerua. Dore.

This Henry was a noble Prince, strong and mighty of body, high of stature, and amiable of countenance, blacke haired, and that somewhat long about the eieb rowes, faire eies, broad breasted, well in flesh, full of merie conceites. Hee was excellent in wit, eloquent in speech, and fortunate in battaile, and for these three hee had three notable vices, Couetousnesse, Cruelties and Lecherie.

Hee maried Mawde the daughter of Malcolme and Margaret, King and Quæne of Scots, of whom he begate William and a daughter named Mawd. At the beginning of his raigne, he restored the state of the Cleargie, allwages the grieuous paiments, reduced againe Saint Edwards lawes, and amended them. He put out of his Court all nice and wanton persons.

Measures reformed.

He reformed the olde vntrue measures, and made a measure by the length of his owne arme, which was then called Vlno, an Elle, and now the same is called a yard, or a metwand, &c.

Vse of fire and lights restored.

He restored to his subiects the vse of lights in the night, which lights and also fire, had been forbidden by his father to be vsed, after the ringing of a bell, at eight of the clocke at night.

Edgar king of the Scots did homage to this Henry.

Robert Shorthose Duke of Normandie, the kinges eldest brother, which was now returned from Hierusalem, made warre vpon his brother Henry for the Crowne of England, who assembled a strong armie, and landed at Portesmouth, but by mediation a peace was made, on condition, that Henry shoulde pay 3000. marks yerelie to duke Robert: and if the one died without issue, the longer liuer should inherit. Winchester was brent the 17. of May, and Glocester was brent the 20. of May. 1101 An. reg. 2.

Robert Fitzham, who came with the Conquerour out of Normandie, with Sibell his wife, sister to Robert Belasme Earle of Shrewsburie, founded anew the Church of Theukesburie, with the offices thereto belonging, and inriched it with large possessions, and was there buried. Theukesburie builded.

Robert de Belasme Earle of Shrewsburie, eldest sonne to Roger Mountgomerie, strengthened the Towne and Castell of Shrewsburie, so did hee the Castels of Bridgenorth, Tichile, and Arundell, with victuailes and armed men against king Henrie: but the king being warned thereof, he gathereth his power and besiegeth Bridgenorth, which Towne was yelded vnto him. And this being knowne to them of Arundell, they forthwith submitted themselues, with condition, that their Lord Robert de Belasme, might be permitted freelie to passe into Normandy. Also they of Shrewsbury sent the keies of their castell, and pledges of their obeisance, and then Robert, with his brother Ernulfus and Roger of Poytiers abiured this land for euer. 1102 Earle of Shrewsburie rebelled. This Matilde, when she sawe the waie to be dangerous for them that trauailed by the Olde forde ouer the riuer of Lue (for she her selfe had beene well washed in that water) caused two stone bridges to bee builded, in a place one mile distant from the Olde forde. Of the which, one was situated ouer Lue at the head of the towne of Stratford, nowe called Bowe, because the bridge was arched like vnto a bow, a rare piece of worke, for before that time the like had neuer beene seene in England. The other ouer the little broke, Bridges, and an high way made ouer the riuer of Lie at Stratford.

commonly called Chanelsebridge. She made the kings high waie of gravell betweene the two bridges. Moreouer, she gaue Manors, and a Mille, commonly called Wiggon Mille to the abbesse of Barking, for the repayring of the bridges and high waie. But afterwarde, Gilbert de Mountfichet builded the Abbey of Stratford in the marishes, the Abbot therof by giuing a piece of money, purchased to himselfe the Manors and Mill aforesaide, and conenanted to repaire the bridges and waie. Till at length, hee laide the charge vpon one Godfrey Prat, allowing him certaine loanes of bread daily, that he should repaire the bridges and way. Who being holpen by the aide of trauailers, did not onely performe the charge, but also was a gainer to himselfe: which thing the Abbot perceiuing, he withholdeth from him parte of the bread promised. Whereupon, Godfrey demaundeth a tole of the wayfaring men, and to them that denied, hee stopped the waie, till at the length, wearied with toyle, hee neglecteth his charge, whereof came the decay and ruine of the stone bridges and way.

An. reg. 19. Knights of the Temple.

About this time, certaine noble men of the horsemen being religiously bent, bound themselues in the hands of the Patriarke of Hierusalem, to serue Christ after the manner of regular Chanons, in chastitie, and obedience, and to renounce their owne proper will for euer. Of which order, the first was the honourable man Hugh Paganus, and Gawfride de Saint Andemare: and there at the first, they had no certaine habitation, Baldwine king of Hierusalem graunted them a dwelling place in his pallace by the Temple, and the Chanons of the same Temple gaue them the streete thereby to build their houses of office in, and the Patriarche, the King, the Nobles, and Prelates gaue them certaine reuenues out of their Lordships. Their first profession was for safegarde of the Pilgrimes, to keepe the waies, against the lying in waite of theeues. About 10. yeeres after, they had a rule appointed them, and a white habite by Pope Honorius, at that time, where they had beene nine in number, they began to increase into great numbers.

But William his son, somewhat more then 17. yéeres of age, who through his fathers kingdomes, lacked nothing but the name of a king, commanded an other ship to be prepared for him, all the yong sons of the nobilitie flocking thither for the company of him, as their play-féere: and the sailers also tippled with to much wine, in lustines bragged that they would quicklie leaue the other behind, that went out before them. So in the darknes of the night, the youth lacking wisedome, and ouercharged with drinke, discharged the ship from the land: the sailed swift as an arrow, and cutting through the dauncing floods, by the negligence of the drunken sailers, dasheth vpon a rocke aboue water, not far from land. The poore soules rose with great crie, bestirred them with their pyned staues, long labouring to get the shippe from the rocke: but fortune was against them, bringing their paines to no purpose: for the side of the shippe, leaning against the rocke, cracked, and the broken Sterne hung downe: nowe it did cast some into the sea, and the water comming in, drowned other, when with calling out a boate, the kings sonne was taken in, and might haue béene saued by returning to land, had not his base sister the Countesse of Perche, wayling with death in the great ship, craued her brothers helpe. He moued with pitie, commanded the boate to be rowed to the shippe, that he might take in his sister, and straightwaie the Boate did sinke, being ouerladen with the great companie that leaped in, and so drowned them all, onelie one clowne escaped, which swimming all night vpon the Mast, shewed all the chaunce of the tragedie in the morning. There was neuer Shippe so miserable to England, nor so famous abroade. There was drowned with William, Richard the kinges other Sonne that hee begate before his kingdome, of one of his Subiectes. Richard earle of Chester, & his brother Otwele the kings sons Tutor, the Countesse of Perche, the kings daughter named Marie, and his niece the Countesse of Chester, sister to Theobald, William Bigot, Geffrey Riddle, Walter de Curcie, Geffrey Archdeacon of Hereford, and also manie the best knightes, and Chaplaines that were in the Court, and noble mens sonnes fit to be knights, to the number of 160. persons, they came together to shew the kings son sport, or do him anie seruice they could: but they made the miserie the more, that they could not bee easilie founde, for searchers being placed all along vpon the sea coasts, found scantlie one of them. King Henry returned out of Normandie into England.

And in the first of August, the king beganne a great councell at Lindon, in the which councell, by authoritie of the Pope, the feast of the Conception of our Ladie was confirmed, the which councell of the Cleargie, (through the simplicitie of the Archbishoppe of Canterburie) were by the king deceiued, for they graunted the king to haue the execution of Iustice concerning the focarie of Priestes, for their keeping of concubines which the Bishoppes afterwarde repented too late: but they could not helpe it. For the king toke infinite summes of money of Priestes, and suffered them to doe what they would.

About this time, men forgetting their byrth, transformed themselues by the length of their heares into the habite of women kinde. One of the knightes of the Realme, a man very prowd of his long heare, at the length stricken in conscience, it seemed vnto him in his sleepe, that one did choake him with the heares of his head (for all men were shaven of their faces.) Wherefore, being awakened, he caused forthwith the superfluitie of his heares to bee cut off. Which example toke place throughout all England for the time, and almost all the knightes were contented to haue their heares cut off. But one yéere was scarcely past, when all that thought themselues courtiers, fell into the former vice, & so contended with women in their long heares, that when they were decayed, they knitte about their heads, certaine roles, and couerings, being ignorant, or forgetting the Apostles saying. Thus among a great manie that king Henrie slew, this Phisition was the last. An. reg. 36. Death of king Henry. Mathew Paris.

King Henry was buried at Reading, which he had founded. He also founded the Priorie of Dunstable, hee conuerted a rich Colledge of Prebends in the Towne of Cirencester, into an Abbey of Chanons regular: hee also builded there an Hospitall of Saint Iohn: and new builded the Castle of Windsor vpon the hill, with a Colledge there, one mile from the old towne of Windlesor. King Edward the third builded much of this Castle, encreased the number of Chanons in the Colledge, adding to the 8. Chanons, a Deane, and 15. Chanons more, and foure and twentie poore impotent knightes, and other Ministers, as appeareth by his Charter dated the two and twentieth of his raigne, hee founded there the order of the Garter. King Edwarde the fourth toke from the Colledges of Eton, and Cambridge founded by king Henry the first, almost a thousand pound by yéere, and gaue to Windlesore. He also builded the faire newe church now vsed, saue onely the toppe and rooffing, which was since finished by the Lord Reinold Bray, and other knights of the Garter. In place of the olde Colledge church, king Henry the seuenth builded a Chappell, where he meant to haue béene buried: but altering his minde, lefte the same vnfinished, and builded his Chappell at Westminster, he made the faire causway betwéene Windsore and London. King Henry the eight made the outer gate-house, which is called the Exchequer of the Honour, where hath beene, and yet continueth a moneth court, kept by the Clearke of the Honor and Castle, for the pleas of the forrest and honors. In which, amongst other thinges, is to be séene the yéerely account, of the charges, of the planting of the Vines, that in the time of king Richard the second grewe in great plenty within the little parke, as also of the making of the wine it selfe, whereof some part was spent in the kings house, and some parte solde to his profite, the tythes whereof were paide to the Abbot of Waltham, then parson both of the olde and new Windlesore. Colledge at Windsor tombed. Iohn Leyland. Wine made at Windlesore, as in other partes of this realme.

King Edward the first beganne to bring water to the Castle: Quéene Marie brought it thither in conduits, the house was before serued by welles: shee also for her parte, added the lodgings for the almes knights, and placed there to the number of twelue, for there had not béene anie of manie yéeres tofore, to wit, in the memorie of men then liuing, whereby it was supposed, neuer any to haue béene there. But true it is, I haue read in the Tower of London, a patent, graunted by Edward the fourth, in the two and twentieth yéere of his raigne, to one Thomas Crabbe Esquire, to be admitted one of the almes knights at Windlesore. Quéene Elizabeth hath also much inlarged with buildings the saide Castle. All which, whether you regarde the wholesomenesse of the ayre, and beautie of the soyle, or the beauty, strength, and situation of the place, or the pleasant passtime arising out of the forrest, chase, and foureténe parkes that wayte vppon it, or the good neighbourhode of the rich Riuer of Thames that runneth by it, I haue thought it good to set downe thus much.

This Henry the first also builded the manor of Woodstocke, with the parke, which he walled with stone seuen miles compasse, destroying for the same, diuers villages, churches, and chappels. This is the first parke that euer was in England; he placed there, besides great store of deere, diuers strange beasts to be kept and nourished, such as were brought or sent to him from farre countries, as Lyons, Leopards, Linces, Porpentines, &c. By his example, Henry Earle of Warwike, made his parke of Wadgenoke, neere vnto Warwike, since called the old parke. He had issue by Matild his first wife, a sonne named
Rad. Dedicero. William, that was drowned in the Sea, and a daughter named Matild, whome with her sonne he appointed to inherite the Crowne and Realme. He had also STephen Earle of Morton, and of Boloigne, sonne to the Earle of Bloys, and Adela, William Conquerors daughter, and nephew to king Henry the first, claymed the kingdome in the month of December, Anno 1135.

He comming into England, was repulsed by them of Douer, shut out by them of Canterbury, but receiued of the Londoners, and pæres of the land, admitted king, and crowned at Westminster on S. Stephens day, by William Archbishop of Canterbury, Henry bishop of Winchester, and Roger bishop of Salisburie.

This was a noble man and hardy, of passing comely fauour and personage, he excelled in martiall policie, gentlenesse and liberality toward all men, especially in the beginning: and although he had continuall warr, yet did he neuer burden his commons with exactions: but vniustly, and contrarie to his othe made to Mawde the Empresse, daughter to king Henry, he toke on him the crowne of England.

A fire

A fire kindled in the house of one Ailward neere vnto London stone, consumed Eastward to Aldgate, and Westward to S. Erkenwalds shrine in Paules church. The Annales of Bermondsey, say, that London bridge was also at that time burned: which might well be, for then, and long before, there was a bridge of timber, as before I haue touched. And further, to confirme the same, I finde in the Annales of Bermondsey, that in anno Christi 1122. the 22. yeere of king Henry the first Thomas Arderne gaue to the Monks of Bermondsey the church of S. When they that kept the Castle sawe the kings power to increase, they yælded themselues. The king toke also the Castle of Webbeley, which Geffrey Talbot had holde against him.

The same daie that the king departed out of Hereford, all beyond the riuer of Wie was bꝛent by the said Geffrey.

The king returned to Oxford, where he toke Roger the bishop of Saꝛum, with the bishop of Lincolne, and his sonne Roger: the bishop of Ely escaping, went to the castle of Elies, and kept it against the king: but at length it was deliuered.

The same time Robert Earle of Glouceſter renounced his allegiance to king Stephen, foꝛtified Bꝛistowe, and other castles. Also Miles the kings constable reuolted.

Wheꝛefoꝛe the king besieged the castle of Bꝛistow, but at length being wearied, he turned to other of the earles castles, and seeing his enemies still increasing, hee called out of Flaunders men of warre with William de Ypres their leader, whose counsell he chiefly followed.

An. reg. 4. The same yeare Roger bishop of Salisburie, a great builder of Castles and houses, departed this life. King Stephen besieged Lincolne against Ranulph Earle of Chester, but Robert Earle of Gloucester, came with a greate power, and rescued the same, chased the kings army, and toke him prisoner on Candlemas day: first he was had to Gloucester, and after to Bristow, and there committed to prison, and put in yrons.

king Stephen taken prisoner at Lincolne.

The Empresse reioicing at this her good hap, departed from Gloucester, and came to Cicester, with Bishoppes, Barons, and other in great number, from thence she went to Winchester, where met her Lords spirituall and temporall in great number, the city with the Towre and Crowne of the realme was deliuered into her hands.

The Bishop of Winchester, that was K. Stephens brother, accursed all that stode against the Empresse, and blessed those that toke her part. From thence she departed to Wilton, where the archbishop of Canterbury came and saluted her. When Easter was past, she went to Reding, where she was receiued with all the honour that might be: thence she went to Orford, where the castell was deliuered vnto her by Robert de Olly: then went she to S. Albons, and was receiued with all honour. Here the citizens of London came and yéelded their citie to her, whereupon she went to London, and so to Westminster, where she being receiued with procession, remained certaine daies, taking order for the state of the Realme, and there she gaue the Bishoprieke of London to Robert de Sigello a Monke of Reding.

King Stephens wife, and many Péres of the realme, made suite to the Empresse to haue the king restored to libertie, and not to the kingdome, promising to perswade with him to become a Monke, but she would not heare. The Bishop of Winchester requested her to giue vnto Eustace his nephew, king Stephens son, his fathers Earledome, but it would not be. The citizens of London required her to restore king Edwards lawes, but she being puffed vp with pride, would not grant their request, whereupon they conspired to take her prisoner: but she aduertised hereof, fledde with shame, leauing behinde her all her furniture of housholde and apparell.

Henry Bishop of Winchester, casting which way to deliuer his brother, perswaded the Londoners to aide him. The Empresse got her to Oxford, and from thence to Glocester, and thence with her assured friend Miles again to Oxford: because she trusted most in him, she to do him honor, gaue him the earledome of Hereford. And now hauing got a great army, about Lammas went againe to Winchester, and lodged in the Castle there. The Bishop abashed of her lodaine comming, departed out at one Gate, as she came in at another. He getting a great army, with the helpe of the Londoners besieged the citie, and the second of August committed the Citie to the fire, with the which, the Nunrie, and houses of office, with more then twenty churches (some write fortie) and a great part of the city, with the monastery of S. Grimbald, and the houses therto belonging, were brought to ashes.

Winchester burnt.

About the exaltation of the Crosse, the Empresse being wearied of long siege, got her to horsebacke with her brother Reginald earle of Cornewall, and many other. Erle Robert followed with a great number of lords and knights, but the bishops men setting on them, slew and tooke a great number.

The Empresse fled.

The Empresse fled to the castle of Lutegershall beanie and almost dead for feare: from thence she was brought to the Castle of Vies, and from thence to Glocester, bound in a horselitter like a dead carcasse.

Earle of Glocester taken.

Erle Robert being pursued, was taken at Stobbridge with erle Warren, & many other, and presented to the queene, as then newly entred into Winchester.

Earle Robert was deliuered to William de Ypres, who put him in prison in the castle of Rochester.

Earle of Hereford fled.

Miles erle of Hereford hardly escaped, and came to Glocester almost naked.

The bishops men brent the monastery of Nunnes at Warwel, &c. the bookes and ornaments of the Nunnes were taken and borne away, and men slaine euen before the Altar. These things thus done, the bishops wrath was somewhat appeased, but his couetousnesse encreased, so that being prompted thereto by the Prior of the newe monasterie in Winchester lately brent, he tooke off of the Crosse that was burnt fiue hundred pounds of siluer, & thirtie marks in golde, three crownes, with as manie seates of fine Arabike golde, set with pre-

King Stephen after the robbing of many churches, burning and robbing of towns and villages by the hands of the Fleming souldiers, he and his brother Henry bishop of Winchester, builded a castle of the Munry at Wilton, to repelle the incursions of them of Salisbury. Earle Robert the first of July fell sodainely vpon them in Wilton, and set the towne on fire. The king with the bishop fled with shame, the earles men spoke the kings people, and sackt his plate and other things: there were taken of the kings men verie many, and among other, William Martell sewer to king Stephen, who was sent to Wallingford, there to be kept prisoner. King Henry the second.

An. reg. 1. HEnry the second, son of Geffrey Plantagenet and Mawd the Empresse, at the age of twenty three yeres, beganne his raigne ouer this Realme of England, the fiue and twentieth daie of October, in the yere of our Lorde 1154. hee was crowned at Westminster the seuenteenth daie of December, by Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury: he was somewhat red of face, short of body, and therwith fat: of speech reasonable, well learned, noble in chiualrie, and fortunate in battell, wise in counsell, one that loued peace, liberall to strangers, but hard to his familiars: vnstedfast of promise, giuen to pleasure, and a wedlocke breaker: by his manhod and politie the crowne of England was much augmented, with the annexing of Scotland, Ireland, the Iles of Orcades, Britaine, Poytiers, Guyen, and other prouinces of France.

Thomas Becket Archdeacon of Canterbury, was made the kings Chancellour, and was now in such fauour, that he was accounted the kings gouernor, for he was chiefly directed by him in all things.

Gerua. Doro. 1155 Flemings voided out of England. He held his Christmas at Wermondsey, where hauing conference with his nobles, for the state of the kingdome, hee promised to banish all strangers. Whereupon William of Ypres, and all the Flemings that had flocked into England, fearing the indignation of the new king, departed the land. And the castles that had béene builded to pill the rich, and spoile the poore, were by the kings commandement, and counsell of his Chancellour throwne down. The king visiting the citie of Yorke, in that countrey receiued diuers castles into his hands, namely amongst other he tooke the Castle of Scarborow, from William earle of Albemarle.

Edward was the sonne of king Edmund named Ironside: whose father was king Etheldred, whose father was the peaceable king named Edgar, the son of Edmund, the son of Edward the seignior, the sonne of Alured, &c.

An. reg. 2. Geru. Dorob. A councell was holden at Walling ford, where the nobles were sworne to the king and his issue.

1156 King Henry went ouer into Normandie, to whome when he was at Roane, came Toricus earle of Flanders with his wife the kings aunt, that he might reconcile vnto him Geffrey his brother, which was then come thither also for that purpose: but Geffrey not accepting the pointes offered by the king, they departed without any agréement, Geffrey expulsing Hoele out of Britaine, tooke the Citie of Naunts, by yeelding of the citizens. And king Henry afterward ward with long siege toke the Castles of Mirable, and Chinon, which Geffrey his brother had holde, whereupon there was a peace concluded betwixt them, that the king should giue to Geffrey, euerie yeare a thousand pound of English money, and two thousand pound of Angeow: and thereupon the third Castle called Lowdune was yelded to the king, and so was the dissention appeased, and king Henry obtained homage, and pledges of all Aquitaine, and Gascoine, and prepared to returne towards England.

S^t William who from being Duke of Aquitain & a very severe Prince turned recluse died at Siena.

This yeare Quéene Elianor brought forth a daughter named Matild. And the same yeare died William the kings eldest sonne, and was buried at Reding.

King Henry hauing ouercome his brother Geffrey returned into England, then with an army went against the Welshmen, where he felled their woods, fortified the castle of Rudland, and recouered many strong holdes. He reedified the castle of Basingwirke, &c. but he lost many of his men, for Henry of Eller that bare the kings standert, as he was assailed amongst his enemies, let fall the standert to the ground, which incouraged the Welshmen in such sort, that the king being sore distressed, had much ado to saue himselfe, and was faine to flie: of whose part, Eustace fitz Iohn, and Robert Curcis, two woorthy knights, with diuers other noble men and gentlemen were slaine. After that Owen incamped and intrenched himselfe at Bryantpine, and skirmished with the kings men daily. And in the meane while that the king was fortifying the Castle of Rudland, his nauy which was guided by Madoc ap Meridith prince of Powelle, anchored in Man or Anglesey, and there spoyled two Churches, and part of the Ile, but as they returned, were all slaine. In the meane time there was a peace concluded betwixt the king and the prince. 1157 King Henry went against the Welchmen. Reedified castles. Henry of Eller.

Quéene Elianor brought forth a son named Richard, at Oxford in the kings pallace there, which pallace was since made a church of white Friers.

A new coyne was made in England. King Henry toke escuage of the Englishmen, the summe whereof grew to 12400. pounds of siluer. Of other countries subiect to him hee gathered also an infinite exaction, and then passed toward Tholouse with an huge army, and besieged that Citie from Midsommer till Hallontide. There were with him Malcolme king of Scots, and a certaine king of Wales, and al the Earles and Barons of England, Normandy, Aquitaine, Anjow, and Gascoine: but Lewis the French king so defended that city, that the kings purpose was frustrate, and the siege raised: and after great and peace and concord betwixt them made, a great discord shortly after followed.

An. reg. 6. 1160 Geruas. Doro. An. reg. 7.

King Henry returned from Tholouse, and Henry the king of Englands son, not 7. yeares olde, maried Margaret the French kings daughter, that was not yet 3. yeares olde.

In this meane time the king, although he were much troubled with wars, yet was he not vnmindfull of Ireland. For directing his messengers to Rome with the letters of abuses, gotten at the councell of Cassels, he also obtained by their suite, of Pope Adrian (an Englishman by birth) a priuiledge, both to haue the dominion of the Irish people, with his authoritie and consent, and also to instruct them in the rudiments of faith and ecclesiasticall rites, after the order of the church of England. Which priuiledge, being sent ouer into Ireland, by Nicholas of Wallingford, then Prior of Malmesbury, and afterward Abbot, and also by William Fitz Adelme, Immediatly there was a synode of Bishops assembled at Waterford, wherein it was read in publike audience, with generall consent of all, by Iohn Bishop of Salisbury, afterward Bishop of Chartiers, who was sent to Rome for that purpose, and by him the foresaide Pope Adrian sent a ring of golde to the king of England in token of the inuestiture, which was incontinently laide vp with the priuiledge in the arches of Winchester. Wherefore, I thought it not superfluous to set downe here the tenure of that priuiledge, but first a word or two of Pope Adrian, because I haue saide, he was an English man, his name was Nicholas Breake-speare, borne at Langley in the Countie of Hertford, sonne to Robert a yonger brother of the house of Breake-speares, which Robert after the death of his wife, professed himselfe a Monke of S. Albons, leauing his son to prouide for himselfe. This yong man passed into France, was chosen a Monke, and after chosen Abbot, went to Rome, was consecrated Bishop of Alba, made Cardinall, sent Legate to the Norwaies, where he reduced that nation from Paganisme to christianitie, and after returned to Rome, when Anastasius was dead, he was chosen Pope, by the name of Adrian the fourth, and now followeth the priuiledge.

Adrian Bishop, seruant of the seruants of God, to his deere sonne, the most excellent king of England, health and Apostolike Benediction, your highnes resolution in the lawdable, and fruitful spreading abroad your glorious name on earth, and in obtaining the reward of eternal felicitie in heauen, while you determine determine like a Catholike Prince to enlarge the boundes and limits of the church, to declare to the vnlearned and rude people, the truth of the Christian faith, and to rote out of our Lords ground the plants of wickednesse; and towards the performance thereof, you require the counsell and fauour of the Apostolike seate: In which action, with how much the more graue counsell, and deepe consideration, you doe procéede, so much the more fortunate successe therein (God assisting you) we nothing doubt you shall haue, for that alwaies they are wont to attaine to a good and happy ende, which take their beginning from the zeale of faith, and loue of true religion. For Ireland, and all other Ilands, to the which Christ the sonne of iustice hath giuen light, and which haue receiued the instructions of the Christian faith, there is no doubt but they doe appertaine and belong to the right of Saint Peter and the holy church of Rome, which also your excellencie acknowledgeth: wherfore how much the more plentifully we do seate in them the faithfull plant, and graffe the bud acceptable to God, so much the more doe we sée that shall bee more strictly required of vs in our inward thoughts: You haue signified to vs (most déere son in Christ) that you will enter into the Ile of Ireland to subdue that people vnto lawes, and that there you will enterprete the plantes of vices, and that you will pate a yéerely pension of one penny for euerie house there to S. Peter, and that you will preserue the rightes of the churches there, whole and inuiolated. And we following with a great fauour your godly and laudable desire, doe gratefully accept, and willingly consent that you do enter into that Iland to enlarge the bounds of the Church, to restraine the course of wickednes, to correct maners, to plant vertue, and augment the Christian religion, and that you doe put in execution those things that shall appertaine to the honour of God and saluation of that land, and the people there shall receiue you honourably, and as their Lord shall reuerence you, the churches right remaining sound, and no way infringed, and alwaies reseruing to S. Peter, and the holy church of Rome, the yeerely pension of euerie house there. If therefore you bring that to passe, which in your mind you haue conceiued, indeuor to informe that nation in good maners, and couet as well by your selfe as by others to instruct such as you perceiue capeable in this faith, in this word, and in this life, that the church there may be adorned, the religion of the Christian faith may be there planted, and may there rest, and that those things that pertaine to the honour of God and saluation of soules be so ordered and disposed of, that of God you may receiue the full measure of euerlasting reward, and in earth obtaine a glorious name for euer.

This that followeth is adioyned to the former Epistle of Pope Adrian the fourth, being an English man, written to king Henry the second.

A brother of the Earle Ferrers was in the night priuily slaine at London, which which when the king vnderstood, he sware that he would be auenged on the Citizens: for it was then a common practise in the citie, that an hundred or more in a company of young and old, would make nightly inuasions vpon the houses of the wealthy, to the intent to robbe them, and if they found any man stirring in the Citie within the night, they would presently murther him, in so much, that when night was come, no man durst aduenture to walke in the streetes. When this had continued long, it fortuned that as a crew of yong and wealthy Citizens assembling together in the night, assaulted a stone house of a certaine rich man, and breaking through the wall, the good man of that house hauing prepared himselfe with other in a corner, when he perceiued one of the theeues named Andrew Bucquinte to leade the way, with a burning brand in the one hand and a potte of coales in the other, which he assayed to kindle with the brande, he flewe vpon him, and smote off his right hand, and then with a loud voice cried theeues, at the hearing whereof the theeues toke their flight, all saving he that had lost his hand, whome the good man in the next morning deliuered to Richard de Lucy the kings Iustice. This theefe vpon warrant of his life, appeached his confederats, of whom many were taken, & manie were fled, but among the rest that were apprehended, a certaine Citizen of great countenance, credite, and wealth, surnamed Iohn the olde, when hee could not acquite himselfe by the Matardome, offered the king for his life 500. markes, but the king commanded that he should bee hanged, which was done, and the citie became more quiet.

King Henry the father kept his Christmas at Caine in Normandy, with his three sonnes, King Henry the yonger, Richard Earle of Poytow, and Geffrey earle of Brytaine: there was also Henry Duke of Saronie, with his wife and their children, the Archbishops of Canterbury and Bolaine, with other bishops, earles and barons in great number. Here would K. Henry the father, that his sonne Henry the young king, should haue receiued homage of his brethren, Richard earle of Poytow, and Geffrey earle of Brytaine, whereunto the earle of Brytaine did not stay to graunt, but the Earle of Poytow vtterly refused to doe it, saying it was not conuenient so long as their father liued, to acknowledge any superioritie to his brother: for as the fathers inheritance was due to the eldest sonne, so he had to claime the lands which belonged to his mother. This denial much offended his brother the young king, whereupon Richarde departed from the Court in great displeasure, and comming into Poytow, he began to fortifie his Castles, that he might be in a readinesse to stand at defence for his safegard, if his father or brethren shoulde come to pursue him. But not long after, king Henry the sonne, by counsell of his father followed him, being also incouraged thereunto by the earles and Barons of Poytow, which for the sharpe and cruell gouernment of earle Richard hated him. And shortly after commeth their brother Geffrey with a great armie in aide of his brother the young king, insomuch that earle Richard not knowing how to shift the present danger, sent to his father for aide. Who being sory to see such vnnaturall dealing amongst his sonnes, gathered an armie, and came forward, and did so much, that all the three sonnes came to Angeres, and there sware to be obedient to their fathers will. Whereupon a day was appointed them to meete at Myrable. In the meane while, king Henry the sonne obtained licence of his father to goe vnto Limongs, vnder pretence that hee might there labour to reduce both his brother Geffrey, and the Barons of Guyen to quietnesse, but all was dissembling, so that when their father followed with an armie, and came to Lymongs in stead of receiuing him with honour, they shot at him, so ỹ they pierced through his vppermost armor, &c. At length, when K. Henry the yonger, and his brother Geffrey had done against their father what they could, & yet could not obtaine their purpose, for that their power was far vncomparable to their wils, K. Henry the yonger, through indignation and displeasure, fell into a grieuous sickne, in a village called Partell, not far from Limongs, where his father lay at siege. RIchard the first borne at Orford, for his valiantnes surnamed Cuer de Lion, or with the lions heart, the third son of Henry the second, began his raigne the sixth day of July, in the yéere of our Lord 1189. at the age of 35. yéeres.

He was bigge of stature, with a merrie countenance. To his his souldiers fauourable: bountifull to his friends: to strangers a grieuous enemie: hard to be pleased: desirous of warre: abhorring idlenesse.

Elianor the olde Quæne, mother to Duke Richard, who at the commandement of her husband, had béene long kept in prison, was set at libertie. And then she with the Lordes of the Realme abode the kings comming at Winchester, where Geffrey Ridle the proud Bishop of Ely fell sicke, and departed this life intestate, leauing in his coffers great treasure, to wit, 3060. markes of siluer, and 205. markes in gold, which was bestowed on the new kings coronation, for the bishops soule. Hee also gaue him in marriage with Isabel his second wife, daughter to Robert Earle of Glocester, the Earledome of Glocester, although Baldwin Archbishoppe of Canterbury forbad the marriage, because they were Cousins in the third degrée of consanguinitie. To Robert earle of Leicester, he restored all his lands, which had béene taken from him. He came to London, and on the third of September, was crowned at Westminster, by the hands of Baldwine Archbishop of Canterburie. Iohn Earle of Morton.

He commanded that no Iewes nor women should be at his Coronation, for feare of enchantments which were wont to be practised: for breaking of which commandement, many Iewes were slain the same day. For the Iewes dwelling about London, and other partes of the Realme, being there assembled, meaning to honour the same Coronation with their presence, and to present to the king some honorable gifte, one of them was stricken by a Christian, who alleadged the kings commandement to keepe them backe, which some of the vnruly people perceiuing, supposing it had béene the kings commandement, fell vpon the Iewes with staues, bats, and stones, beate them to their houses, and after assailing their houses, set them on fire, and burnt them in their houses, or slew them at their comming out.

The Archbishoppe of Canterburie being sore offended with Earle Iohn the kings brother, for taking to wife Isabel Countesse of Glocester, his cousin in the thirde degrée, wrote a threatning letter to the same Iohn, commaunding him not to touch the virgine, and to appeare at a peremptorie day before him to answere the matter. The 15. of December at Pipwell, in presence of the king, the Archbishop and prelates were elected, Geffrey de Lucy to the sea of Winchester, Richard Archdeacon of Ely, the kinges treasurer, to the sea of London, Hubert Walter to Salisbury, William Longshampe, the kinges Chan-

Nowe Eustachius de Marke knight, Lorde of Fuelles about this time, founded thereby a Priorie in honour of GOD and Saint Thomas, for Chanons Regular. After which time, there were many houses built, by meanes whereof the Towne beganne to rise, and by little and little to encrease, so that in place of Crux Roisiæ, it is called the Towne of Roisia, or Royston. King Richard hauing knowledge that Philip of France inuaded Normandie, and that Iohn his brother had made himselfe king of England, made peace with the Saladine for three yeares, and with a small company returning homeward, was taken prisoner by Leopold Duke of Austria, who brought him to Henry the Emperour, and there kept him in prison a yéere and fiue moneths. Elianor the olde Quéene caused the Sea Coastes to bee watched ouer against Flaunders, but notwithstanding Earle Iohn came secretlie into England to raise the Welshmen and Scottes, but the king of Scottes would not aid him. The Welshmen in the partes about Kingstone and Windsore woke praies abroad.

The French king entred Normandie, founde small resistance, wan diuers townes, Gisors was deliuered to him, then he hasted towards Roane, and besieged it, but through the great industry of Robert erle of Leicester, he profited little there, and so returned into France. Earle Iohn perceiuing his treason was discouered, fortified his castelles, and passed ouer into France, and ioined with the French king.

King Richard sent for his mother and the archbishop of Roane to come vnto him to Almain; being now in great hope to be deliuered, & in the meane time the archbishop of Canterbury was made regent of England.

Imbassadors were sent from Philip king of France, and the like from earle Iohn to the Emperor, offering great sums, vpon condition that king Richard might remaine still in prison, vntil the feast of S. Michael next comming, or els to deliuer him into their hands. The Emperor shewed these letters to K. Richard, which draue him into great dispaire of deliuerance.

The kings friends intreating for his deliuerance, his ransome was set at 100000. pound, to witte to the Emperour 100000. markes, to the Empresse 30000. markes: and to the duke of Austrich 20000. marks: whereupon commandement was directed from the Kinges Iustices, that all Bishoppes, Prelates, Earles, Barons, Abbots, and Priors, should bring in the 4. part of their reuenues towards the kings raunsome, and besides this, the Cleargy brought in their golden and siluer chalices, and fleeced their shrines, all which was coined into money. In the meane time letters were intercepted of Earle Iohn which hee had sent into England touching treason, one Adam of Saint Edmond Clearke, being sent by earle Iohn, to prouide that his Castles might be fortified against King Richard, came to London, and dined with Hubert Archbishop of Canterburie, where he bragged of Earle Iohns prosperitie and familiaritie with the French king, for the which being suspected, he was after dinner apprehended by the Maior of London, who tooke from him his letters, and deliuered them to the Archbishoppe of Canterburie, who on the next morrow called a Councell of the Earles and Barons, and shewed them the letters, whereupon they all consented that Earle Iohn should bee dispossessed of all his land in England, and that his Castles should be besieged. The same day the same Archbishop and Bishops excommunicated earle Iohn and all his fauourers, which troubled the peace of the kingdome. And forthwith the Archbishop besieged the Castle of Marleborough, which belonged to Earle Iohn, and tooke it. After this he besieged Nottingham Castle.

King Richard being in Normandie kept his Christmas at Roane, whiles both the king of Englande and Fraunce were bent to trie their malice by dint of sworde, there came messengers to eche of them from the Pope, exhorting them to peace, but they preuailed not, for as soone as the truce was ended, they got them to the field, King Richard drawing toward Iseldune, a towne in the confines of Berie, from thence he went to Vzsen, and tooke the Castle there, then went hee to a towne called Nouen court, this he besieged and it was yelded,

In the meane time the K. of France besieged Albemarle, whereupon K. Richard came to raise the siege, & there was a sharpe fight, but the English men wearie with trauaile of their iourney, and being rashly entred into the battell, were not able to endure the French mens violence, and so not without great losse, were constrained to retyre.

King Richard sent messengers to the Pope, complaining vpon the Duke of Austrich, for misusing of him and his, as they came by distresse of weather through his Countrey: whereupon the Pope excommunicated the Duke, and enioyned him to release the couenants that hee constrained the king to make and to send home the pledges: but the duke refused this order, contemning the Popes authoritie, who shortly after hauing broken his legge, and in extreame anguish ended his life, and was kept vnburied till his sonne had released the English pledges that lay in hostage for the money behind of K. Richards raunsome, and further sware to stand to the iudgement of the Church in that offence of his Father.

Thus were the pledges restored, and the residue of the money behind released, which thing to king Richard was both pleasant and profitable, for taking occasion thereof to amend his former life, into a better order, he put away his Concubines, and toke him to his wife, whom of long time he had not known. Moreouer, the Emperour gaue to the Cisteaux Monkes, 3000. markes of siluer, parcell of king Richards raunsome to make siluer censars in euery church of that order, but the Abbots refused the gift, being a portion of so vngodly and wrongfull gaine, at which thing king Richard greatly maruelled at the first, but after commended the Abbots in their doinges chiefly for shewing that they were voide of the accustomed greedinesse, that men noted to haue beene in them.

Starling money.

King Richard hauing refreshed his souldiours, went to Miligio, and by assault wanne it at the first brunt, and made it leuell with the groond. After this, there was a motion made for peace betwixt the two kings, being now wearied with long wars. Whereof, when Earle Iohn was aduertised, hee beganne to doubt, lest by agreement made, he might be betrated by the king of France, vpon couenants passing betweene them, and therefore determined to commit his whole safety to his naturall brother: whereupon comming to king Richard hee besought him of pardon for his offences, and though hee had not dealt brotherly towards him, yet, that he would brotherly forgiue him his rebellions trespas, &c. Vpon whose submission, and by the intreating of Elianor his mother and other, in the ende king Richard did not onely pardon him his life, but vpon his owne, restored him to the Earledomes of Mortaigne in Normandie, and Glocester in England, with the honor of Eye, the Castles except, and in recompence of his other earldomes, his brother gaue him yerely 8000. pounds of Anglow money. William Fitz Osbert a citizen of London, poore in degree, euill fauoured of shape, but yet verie eloquent, moued the common people to seeke libertie and freedome, and not to be subiect to the rich and mighty, by which meanes he drew to him many great companies, and with all his power defended ye poore mens cause against the rich. 52000 Londoners he allured to him to be at his deuotion and commandement.

The king being warned of this tumult, commanded him to cease from these attempts, but the people still followed him, as they before had done: he made to them Orations, taking for his theame this sentence, Haurietis aquas in gaudio de fontibus saluatoris, which is to say, Ye shall drawe in ioy, waters out of the welles of your Sauiour. And to this he added: I am (saide he) the Sauiour of poore men, yée be poore, and haue assaied long the hard hands of rich men. Now drawe yee wholsome water forth of my welles, and that with ioie, for the

This William was commanded to appeare before the kings counsel to answere for himselfe in such causes as should be laid against him, where he appeared, but with such a multitude of people, that the Lordes were afraid, and remitted him with pleasant wordes for the time, appointing some priuily when he was alone to apprehend him. He tooke the steeple of Bowe Church in Cheape, and fortified it with munition and victuailes. The archbishop of Canterbury then being at London with other Iustices sent to him, and willed him to come forth of the church, he should haue his life saued: but hee refused to come forth, wherefore the Archbishop talking with the citizens of London called together a great number of armed men least anie furre should be made.

The Saterday therefore being the Passion Sonday euen, the steeple and church of Bowe were assaulted, and William with his complices taken, but not without bloudshed, for he was forced by fire & smoake to forsake the church. he was brought to the Archbishop in the Towre, where he was by the Iudges condemned, and by the heeles drawne from thence to a place called the Elmes, and there hanged with nine of his fellowes. Yet after the death of this wicked malefactor, the simple people honored him as a Martyre, insomuch that they steale away the gibbet whereon he was hanged, and pared away the earth, that was be-bled with his blod, and kept the same as holy reliques to heale sicke men.

Moreouer, he sent Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, William Marshall, and Geffrey fitz Peter chiefe Iustice into England, to proclaime his peace to be kept amongst the rest of the Nobles of the Realme. These, when they came into England, caused all men to sweare to be true to Earle Iohn, and so went forward to Northampton, where they called together all those nobles, bles, whome they doubted, and promised in the name of Earle Iohn, that hee shoulde restore vnto them, and to all men, their right: and vpon that condition they gaue to him their fidelities. Also they sent worde by Eustace de Vescy, to William king of Scots, that earle Iohn at his returne into England should content him for all his right which hee claymed in England, and therefore willed him in the meane season to be faithfull to the said Earle, and to kéepe his peace, which hee promised, by which meanes all strife and debate in Englande was appeased.

This being done, Earle Iohn entring into the countrey of Aniow held his Easter at Beaufort, and on the morrow after, he sent Quéene Elianor and Marchadius vnto the Citie of Aniow, who with a warlike power spoyled it, and carried the citizens away captiues.

Earle Iohn tooke the kings treasure.

In which meane time earle Iohn came to Roan, and there by the ministerie of Walter Archbishop of Roan, he was girt with the sword of the dukedome of Normandy, in the Cathedrall church, where the Archbishop before the high altar, did set a Crownet of golde vpon his head, artificially made with Roses of golde, &c. Duke Iohn sware vpon the holy Euangelists to defend the Church and liberties thereof, to see Iustice ministred to the people, good lawes put in execution, and euill lawes suppressed.

Earle Morton duke of Normandy.

When Iohn Duke of Normandie sayled ouer into England, and arriued at Shorham on the fiue and twentieth date of Maie, and came to London on the Ascension éeuen, where the Archbishops, Bishops, Earles, Barons, and other being present, Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury standing vp in the middest of them all, said in effect as followeth:

Archbishop his Oration.

Your discréete wisedomes doe knowe (right honorable) that by most reason none ought to succéede in the kingdome, except by the vniuersall consent of the whole realme (praying for the grace of the holy ghost) he be chosen according to the excellencie of his qualities and behauiour, by the example of the first annointed king Saul, whome our Lord appointed vnto his people, not being the son of any king, neither of the progeny of any king. Likewise, after him, he made Dauid King, the sonne of Ishai, who was a stoute man, apt and méete for the worthy dignitie of a king, and that because he was holy and humble, so that he which doth in such sort excel in prowesse all other in the kingdome ought to be chosen to gouerne the same: but if there be any of the kings linage that doth excell other, we ought to be readie to elect and chuse him. This I speake touching the noble Duke Iohn, brother to our late excellent king Richard now deceased, which had none heire proceeding of his bodie. Which Duke Iohn appeareth plainly vnto vs, to be both wary and stout, whom therefore beseeching the holy ghost of his grace, we doe with one consent elect and chuse, as being both of the same worthines, and also of the same bloud and kindred that king Richard was of.

Roger Wend.

This archbishop indéede was a man of déepe vnderstanding, a singular pillar of stabilitie, and of incomparable wisedome, so that no man was so bold as to make any reasoning of the matter at that time, because they knowe well ynough that he did not without cause define in such sort of this thing: wherefore the Duke Iohn, and all other there present did accept of the choise, crying, Vivat Rex. But afterwards, the archbishop being demaunded, why he made this election, he answered, and said, that by certaine Oracles, and by the gift of prophecie, he was certified, that this Iohn should once take to himselfe the realme and crowne of England, and should bring the same into great confusion: therefore, to the end he should not haue so much occasion to bring these thinges to passe, he saide, that he was so to be elected to the kingdome, though the same by succession of inheritance belonged not to him, and so he set the crowne vpon his head, and annointed him king at Westminster in Saint Peters church, vpon the Ascension day, which was the xxv. and twentieth day of Maie: he was sworne to loue the catholike church and ordinances thereof: to keep and defend the same harmeles from the inuasion of euill disposed persons: to disanull peruerse lawes, and erect good lawes, and according to the same to minister true iudgement throughout his kingdome.

States created.

The same day king Iohn inuested William Marshall with the sword of the earledome of Striguile, and Geffrey fitz Peter with the earledome of Essex, and they serued that day at the table with their swordes girt to them. Also Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, was made Lord Chancellour of England.

Whilest these thinges were in doing in England, Philip king of France with an army, brake into Normandy, and tooke the citie of Euereux, the towne of Argues, and diuers other places from the English, and passing forth into Maine, recouered that countrey. Also the Britaines, wanne the townes of Gorney, Butenant and Genseline: they tooke also ye city of Angiers, &c. Which being signified to king Iohn, he went ouer into Normandy, where many submitted themselues to him: but a truce was taken betwixt the king of France and him, vntill the 26. of August. In the meane time, king Philip of France made Arthur Plantagenet duke of Britaine, knight of the field, and receiued of him homage for Anioue, Poitiers, Turon, Maine, Britaine, and Normandy: for the which the said king Philip promised by othe to aide him in recouerie thereof.

Philip of France bound by othe to aide duke Arthur.

Price of wines.

King Iohn made a law, that no tunne of Rochell wine should be sold dearer then xx. shillings, of Aniow for xviii. shillings, of France xv. shillings, and not aboue, vnlesse the same were of such principal goodnes, that some for their vse would giue xvi. shillings viii. pence for the tun, and not aboue in any case.

A gallon (by retale) of Rochel wine to be sold for iiii. pence, the gallon of white wine not aboue vi. pence. It was also ordained, that in euery citie, towne and place where wine was vsed to be solde, there should be vii. honest men sworne to haue regard that this assise should not be broken: and if that they found any Vintner that should sell any wine by retaile contrary to the same assise, his body should be attached by the thirsse and detained in prison, till order was taken for his further punishment, and his goods seized to the kings vse: and the like punishment was appointed for such as should sell by the tunne, hogshead, or otherwise, contrary to the assise.

Philip king of France, and Iohn king of England met betwixt the castles of Maylun, and Butenant, where they agreed vpon a peace, that king Iohn should quite claime vnto the French king, and his heires for euer, all Vilge to Sin, Gilors, and other castles. Also king Iohn gaue in marriage with his neece Blanch, daughter to Alfonse, king of Castile, vnto Lewis, sonne and heire to Philip king of France, all the castles which the same Philip had taken in Normandy, that is to say, Vernon, Valley, Pacy, and Nonancourt, and many other cities, townes, castles, &c. besides to king Philip 30000. marks. King Philip then restored Arthur to king Iohn, and receiued of him homage for Britaine and Richmond, both kings sware to obserue this peace firme with their seale for euer.

Philip of France declineth duke Arthur to his enemy.

King Iohn hauing made peace beyond the seas, returneth into England, where he requireth an aide of his realme to pay the thirty thousand marks, and edict was made, that euerie plowland should paie three shillings, which troubled the land sore, considering the escuage that went before, which was for euery knights fee two marks, which before time was neuer but twenty shillings. King Iohn went ouer, and hauing paid his thirty thousand marks to the king of France, he was there by the hands of Helias Archbishop of Burdeaux, and the Bishops of Poitiers, and Scone, diuorced from his wife Isabell, daughter to Robert Earle of Gloucester, because of nearenesse of blood, as touching her in the third degree: And then he married Isabell daughter to Amerie Earle of Angolesme; which Isabel before Hugh surnamed Brune Earle of Marches had taken to wife.

king Iohn diuorced from Isabel his wife, married another Isabell.

This being done, king Iohn returned with his new wife, and crowned her Quéene at Westminster on the eight of October. And the same day king Iohn commaunded Hugh Neuill chiefe forrester, and the other forresters to warne all the Monkes of the Cisteaux order throughout England, that from the Octaues of Saint Michaell, vnto the Quindem, they shoulde remoue all their horses, their swine, and other cattell whatsoeuer off the forrest ground: and if any were after found vpon ỹ forrest ground, they should be sold to the kings vse. The monkes prouided for themselues, and patiently bare the kings displeasure.

The archbishop of Canterbury sent to all the Abbots of that order, aduising them to méete the king at Lincolne on the xv. of November, that being together, by his helpe they might attempt to appease the kings mode, they did as they were willed. The archbishop counselled them, the next day to méete the king without the city, and to humble themselues vnto him, but they thought not this to bee the best waie, lest those that rode before the king should abuse them.

King of Scots did homage to king Iohn.

The next day king Iohn talked with William king of Scots that was come to Lincolne, with Rotland Lord of Galloway, and many other noblemen, to doe homage to the king.

The nert day the Archbishoppe moued the king in the matter touching the Abbots, but the king willed him not to bere his spirits, for he meant that day to be let bloud.

1201 On Sonday next following, the archbishop caused the abbots to come into the kings presence at masse time: wherupon, after the king had heard masse, and comming forth of the church, the Archbishop besought him to beare their sute, and then they falling downe at the kings feete, besought him to haue pity vpon them: the king commaunded one to bring the Abbots into his chamber, and he with the Archbishop, bishops, and Nobles went into the same chamber before them, where, when they had sate a while, the king rose vp, and went into an inner chamber, there to conferre with the noblemen, such as pleased him; and after comming forth, called for the archbishop and certaine other bishops, with whome he talked secretly: and after the Abbots being called, the king appointed the Archbishop to declare vnto them his pleasure, which was, that although the king had shewed himselfe in wordes to be offended with them, yet he neuer meant hurt to that order, and now had put away all rancour and malice towards them: herewith they fell downe on the ground, and gaue humble thanks to the king, and withall, the archbishop inferred, that the king requested them to forgiue him: and the king herewith fell downe, watering his cheekes with teares, and they likewise at his feete. The Archbishop, after both parties were vp on their feete, said, that the king required, that by their intercession he might be made a brother in the chapiter of the Cisteaux, and that they would procure him to be admitted: Moreouer, the king, he saide, minded to build a house of that order, that he might be had in memorie, and would be a patron and defender of their order. The Abbots being greatly reioiced, departed, praising God.

1201 King Iohn going into Ireland tooke a great piece of money there, and returning into England, was crowned together, with his Queene at Canterburie on Easter day.

King Iohn with Isabel his Queene sailed into Normandie, fell in communication with Philip king of France, where they agréed so well, that they passed together into France, where king Iohn was honorably receiued at Saint Denys, and into Paris, &c.

An. reg. 3. Hugh Brune rebelled.

A nobleman of Aquitaine named Hugh Brune, rebelling against king Iohn inuaded diuers parts of the prouince, because the king had maried the daughter of the Earle of Angolesme, whome the said Brune had affied, and had in his custodie, wherefore they passed ouer, and restrained the rebelles from their attempts.

Prodigma. Tempests.

The fiue and twentieth of June there arose a cruel tempest of thunder, lightning, and haile, with a vehement raine, that destroyed corne, cattell, men, and houses, by burning them, &c.

The tenth of July, another tempest much like to the former hapned, so that the medowes could not be mowed, and the hay that was downe, was carried away by the outragious course of waters that overflowed the ground, great numbers of fishes through the corruption of the waters died, manie bridges borne downe, corne and hay carried away, and many men drowned, so that all men thought a new deluge had beene come.

King Iohn sharply warred vpon the Earle of March, Hugh Brune, and the earle of Eue his brother, who being not able to resist, they complained to Philip king of France, as to their soueraigne and chiefe Lord, who sent oft times to king Iohn, moving him to cease from vexing them, but that would not serue: wherefore he was sommoned by the nobles of France as duke or earle of Aquitaine and Anlow, to come vnto the court of the French king, and to stand to the iudgement of his peeres, all which king Iohn denied, whereupon the same court adiudged him to be depriued of all his lands, which he or his predecessours held of the king of France, &c. 1202 Ralph. Cogshall. An. reg. 4.

King Iohn sommoned to the French kings Court.

King Philip forthwith assembled an army, and inuaded the castle of Buteuant in Normandy, which K. Richard had builded, he raced it to the ground. He tooke the land of Hugh Gorney, and all the Castles thereabout. He tooke the Castle of Albemarle, with the countie of Eue, and all the land to Arches, none resisting him. Also Arthur earle of Britaine being made knight by the French king, whose yonger daughter he had affianced, he being but sixteene yeres old, went to Hugh Brune, and Geffrey of Lucingham, and with two hundred and fiftie knightes, besieged the Castle of Mirable, in which Quéene Elianor his Aunt was inclosed: but king Iohn came with a power, and deliuered his mother from danger. He tooke there his Nephewe Arthure, William de Brawsa, Geffrey de Lucingham, Hugh Brune, Andrew Cauchy, Saluaricus de Mauleon, and diuers others.

Great thunder and lightning, with haile as bigge as hennes egges, &c.

The waters increased, and did much hurt in England. Arthur earle of Britaine, from Falaise was brought to Roan, and put in the Tower vnder the custodie of Robert de Veypont, where shortly after he was dispatched of his life, some say by the handes of his vncle Iohn. 1203

The king of France inuaded the castles of Normandy, tooke Lisle, Vandeley, with the Castle, and the vale de Ruell, in the which were Robert fitz Walter, Sayer de Quincy, and manie other. Hee tooke the strong Castle vpon Seine, builded by king Richard, which had beene valiantly kept by the constable of Chester.

Among many other that found themselues agreeued with the shamefull murder of duke Arthur, sonne to Geffrey duke of Britaine, king Iohns elder brothers sonne, and therefore rightfull heire to the crowne and realme of England, was Iohn Courcy the valiant conqueror, and earle of Vlster in Ireland: Which being brought to the kings eares, he cast the saide Courcy into the Tower of London. and K. Iohn (as ye haue heard) so that the king of France bereft him of all the lands that he held in fée of the Crowne of France, and among other matters, he sent hither a mightie man, who should try that quarel with an English champion by combat: To vndertake the which, the king mooued Courcy, who boldlie answered him, that in his quarrell, whose murtherous vile minde, cowardlines, traiterous conditions, and tyrannicall gouernement deserued not the aduenture of losing one droppe of blod, hee would not fight one stroke, but for the honour of the realme, wherein many a good and honourable man liued, to his great griefe, he would willingly ieopard his life, and cheerefully accept the combat, yea with a grant. But no harme was doone, for the Frenchman, as soone as he sawe the mightie limbs, and fierce countenance of Courcy, went swaie.

King Iohn doubting treason in his owne men, in December returned into England, where he gathered great aids of money.

The monkes of Canterburie, by the aduise of the Pope, elected Stephen Langton to be their Archbishop, and then Pope Innocent intending to obtaine the fauour of king Iohn towardes this election, because hee knewe that hee did make diligent search for precious stones, sent him an eloquent Epistle, with diuers precious Iewelles, which were of king Iohn well accepted: and Stephen Langton was consecrated at Rome. Then the Pope sent letters to king Iohn, humblie exhorting him to receiue the saide Stephen Archbyshop of Canterburie, being thereunto canonicallie elected, the rather because hee was an Englishman borne, and a doctor of diuinitie, &c. But king Iohn being greatlie offended with the promoting of the said Stephen, sent men in armour to expell the monkes of Canterburie, to the number of thrée score and foure out of the Realme, and condemned them of treason, the monkes went into Flaunders, and their goods, and lands of their church was confiscate. Pledges hanged. The king gathered a great army, minding vtterly to destroy all the coasts of Wales, but when he came to Nottingham, he caused eight & twenty pledges of the Welshmen to be hanged, and immediatly after, whilest he sate at meate, there came a messenger, that brought him Letters from the King of Scots, informing him, that he should be betraied; and likewise also came another messenger out of Wales, from the kings daughter, wife to Lewline king of Wales, certifying him of the same conspiracie, that is to say, that if he did not leaue off and desist from that he had begun, his nobles would either kill him themselues, or else betray him to his enemies to be killed.

Wherefore, when the king came backe to London, he sent messengers to all the great men whome he suspected to be vntrue to him, and demanded pledges of them, who daring not disobey the kings commandement, sent to him their sonnes, nephewes, and kinsfolke to be at the kings pleasure.

Peter of Pontfreite. About this time in the prouince of Yorke, there was an Heremite named Peter of Pontfract, who was also called the Wise, because hee had declared vnto many diuers strange things that were to come. This Heremite prophecied openly of king Iohn, and said, that vpon the Ascension day next comming, there there should be no king, nor from thencefoorth, but he said the crowne should at that day be translated to another. Whereof, when the king heard tell, hee commanded this Heremite to be brought vnto his presence, and demanded of him, whether the king shoulde die as that day, or no, or else, in what order the king should be depriued of his raigne. The Heremite answered, Knowe this most certainly, that at that day, thou shalt not be king: and if I be found a liar, then doe with me what ye will. And the king said it should be euen so, as thou hast saide, and so committed him to William de Harcourt to keepe, and he kept him in streight prison, vntill he sawe the end.

There were at that time manie noble men in England, whose wiues and daughters the king had oppressed, and othersome, whome with extreme exactions hee had brought into great pouertie, and othersome, whose parents and friendes the king had banished, and had turned their inheritance vnto his owne vse: so that king Iohn had almost, as many enemies as hee had nobles, and great men, and the report was that they did send their writing and charter to the king of France, sealed with their seales, wherein they promised him, that if he would come and inuade England, they would receiue him, and crowne him with honour.

Archbishop of Canterbury and other bishops complaine of king Iohn.

About this time, Stephen Archbishop of Canterburie, William Bishoppe of London, and the Bishop of Ely, went to Rome, and informed the Pope how many enormious deedes king Iohn with great contumacie had done against God and his holy Church: wherefore they humbly besought him to helpe and succour the church of England, which now was in great danger. Whereupon the Pope determined, that king Iohn should be deposed, and another more worthy set in his place: Toward the execution whereof, the Pope wrote his letters to king Philip of France, willing him to expulse the king of England, and he should for euer possesse the kingdome.

London bridge perished with fire.

Ex record. S Mariæ de Southw.

The tenth daie of July at night, a marueilous and terrible chance happened, for the Citie of London vpon the South side of the riuer of Thames, with the Church of our Lady of the Chanons in Southwarke being on fire, and an exceeding great multitude of people passing the bridge, either to extinguish and quench, or else to gaze, beholde, sodainly the north part, by blowing of the South winde was also set on fire, and the people which were euen now passing the bridge, perceiuing the same, would haue returned, but were stopped by fire, and it came to passe, that as they staied, or protracted time, the other end of the bridge also, namely the South end was fired, so that the people thronging themselues betwixt the two fires, did nothing else expect or looke for then death. Then came there to aide them many ships and vessels, into the which, the multitude so vndiscreetly pressed, that the ships being drowned, they all perished: it was said, through the fire and the shipwracke, that there were destroyed about three thousand persons. William Packington writeth, that there were found in part or halfe burnt three thousande bodies, besides those that were quite burned that could not be found.

About this time, the king of France waſted the king of Englandes landes beyonde the Seas, and the king of England likewiſe waſted his: but at the length a truce was taken, and an arme of the Sea being betwixt either hoſte, there was a Knight in the Engliſhe hoſte that cryed to them of the other ſide, willing ſome one of their knightes to iuſt a courſe oꝛ twaine: whereupon without ſtaie, Robert Fitz Walter made himſelfe readie, ferried ouer, and got on his hoꝛſe without anie man to helpe him, and beeing readie againſt the face of his enimie, at the firſt courſe hee ſtroke the other ſo hard with his great ſpeare, that hoꝛſe and man fell to the ground, and when his ſpeare was broken, he went backe againe to the king of France: by Gods teeth (quoth king Iohn) he were a king indeede that had ſuch a knight. Roberts friendes hearing that, kneeled downe, and ſaide, O king he is your knight, it is Robert Fitz Walter: and the nert daie he was ſent foꝛ, and was reſtoꝛed to the kings fauour, and by his meanes peace was concluded, and he receiued his liuinges, and had leaue to repaire his caſtels, &c. Theꝛe the moſt foꝛcible and valiant knights of England in thoſe daies were Robert Fitz Walter, Robert Fitz Roger, and Richarde Mount Fichet.

Robert Fitz Walter reſtoꝛed to the kings fauour.

King Iohn cauſed a great armie to be gathered at Douer in the Lent ſeaſon, and gathered together a great nauie of Ships, and whileſt he remained about the Sea coaſt with his foꝛce to withſtande the French king when hee ſhoulde come, there arriued two bꝛethꝛen of the Temple at Douer, which came to the king and in friendlie manner ſaide vnto him: Wee bee ſent vnto thee (moſt mightie mightie king) in the behalfe of Pandolph, who for the commoditie of you & of your realme desireth to haue talke with you, for he hath to propound vnto you a certaine forme of peace, whereby you may be reconciled to God, and to the Church, notwithstanding that you be condemned by sentence in the courte of Rome to be deposed from the title of your realme.

When the king had considered well the message of those templars, he gaue them commaundement to cause Pandolph to come ouer vnto him. And not long after, Pandolph came to the king at Douer, and said vnto him: Behold, the most mighty king of France lieth with an inuincible number of ships, and a great multitude of knights, horsemen and footemen in the hauen, readie to come ouer to inuade, and depose you, as a rebell vnto God, and vnto ỹ Pope: there come with him also the Bishops that of late were banished out of England, with the clearkes and lay men, to the end, that whether ye will or no, they hauing the French king to their captaine, they may receiue their bishoprickes and goods. Pandolph the Legate.

The king of France also doth boast that he hath Charters almost from all the Nobles of England of their allegeance and subiection vnto him, so that thereby he doubteth not but to bring his purpose to passe. Nowe therefore at the last looke to your owne commodity, that you may come to repentance, and make no delay to reconcile you to God, whom you haue prouoked to take vengeance vpon you. For if you make assurance, that for his sake, which humbled himselfe for you, you will humble your selfe to the iudgement of the Church, you may recouer your realme: from which, for your contumacie you be adiudged and condemned by the court of Rome to be deposed. Nowe therefore that your enemies doe not reioice ouer you, turne into your owne heart, and take hede that you doe not bring your selfe into such a distresse as you shall not be able to ridde your selfe out againe.

With these words K. Iohn was moued to repentance, chiefly considering 4. things. The first, for that he stood excommunicate the space of fiue yeares. The second, he feared the comming of Philippe king of Fraunce, which lay round about the Sea coastes with a great force, prepared to depose him. Thirdly, he feared, that if he should ioine battell with his enemies, the nobles of England would either leaue him in the fielde, or deliuer him to his enemies. And the fourth, which he feared most, was because Ascension day was at hand, when according to the prophecie of Peter the Hermite, he should lose both his life, and kingly authoritie, both spirituall and temporall. For these and such like causes, King Iohn being fallen into desperation, did followe the perswasion of Pandulph, and take his othe vpon the Euangelists, that in the presence of Pandulph, he would stand to, and obey the iudgement of the Church, and 16. of his Earles and Barons did sweare the same, and couenanted that if he peraduenture should repent him of his othe, they would compell him, so much as lay in them to performe it. Thus on the 13. of Maie, on Munday before Ascension day, the K. and his Nobles, Earles, and Barons, mette with Pandulph at Douer, where with one consent they agreed vpon a forme of peace. K. Iohn moued to repentance.

King Iohn, and Pandolph, with the Nobles of the Realme, came together at at the house of the knights of the Temple, by the town of Douer, on the 15. day of May, being the Ascension Euen, where the king, according as sentence was giuen at Rome, did resign his Crowne, with the realmes of England and Ireland into the Popes handes: whose Vicegerent at that time was Pandulph a, foresaid; and when he had made this resignation, hee gaue the aforesaide kingdomes to the Pope, and to his successors, and confirmed his gift with a Charter, dated the 15. of May, in the 14. yeere of his raigne. When the Ascension day was past, he commanded the foresaid Peter the Hermite to be set out of the castle of Corke, to be bounde to a Horse-taile, drawne through the stretes to Warham, and there both he and his son to be hanged on a gibbet.

K. Iohn resigned the crowne of England.

The 17. of August, Stephen Langton Archbyshoppe of Canterburie, and all the other that were banished, arryued at Douer, and went to Winchester to the king, who meeting them in the waie, fell flatte vpon the earth before their fete, and with teares besought them to take pittie on him, and of the Realme of England. The Archbyshop and Byshoppes likewise, with teares tooke him vp from the ground, and brought him vnto the doores of the Cathedrall church, and with the Psalme of Miserere absolued him: then the king tooke an othe to call in all wicked Lawes, and to put in place the Lawes of king Edward. Diuine seruice being ended, the king, the archbishop, bishops and nobles, dyned al at one table.

cour, and of the Dukes of Louaine, Brabant, and Hollande, of Reignolde Earle of Bologne, and Ferrandis Earle of Flaunders, so that there was a greate Fielde fought, in which the French King escaped narrowlie, but being rescued, hee tooke the foresayde Earles, put Hugh de Bones to flighte, and droue the Emperour out of the Fielde, and then a Truce was taken betwirt King Iohn and the king of Fraunce for fiue yeeres, by the Popes commandement, as some saide, but as other said, this truce was agreed by meanes of 6000. marks, which the king of England gaue, fearing to incounter with the great multitude of Frenchmen.

The Louvreal of Paris begun by Ph. Augustus it was finished by Lewis XIV.

King Iohn hauing finished his warres beyond the Seas, as yée haue heard, came ouer into England, about the fourteenth of Nouember. And the same time the Earles and Barons of the Realme, especiallie them of the North, came to talke with the king, hee being then at Saint Edmundesburie, but their intent was not only to talk with him, as well appeared: for after they had along season handeled the matter among themselues, they brought forth the charter of king Henry the first, which they had receiued of Stephen the Archbish. whereof we haue made mention here before. And so they came together into S. Edmonds Church, where the chiefest of them beganne, and they all sware by the high Altar, that if the king woulde not graunt the foresayde Lawes and Liberties, they woulde make warres against him, and withdrawe themselues out of his allegeance, vntill hee did with his Seale confirme and ratifie the same. And they consented all on this, to come to the king after Christmas, and in the meane season they would prouide themselues both of armor, horses, and munition.

K. Iohn returned into England.

The Barons require the Charter of Liberties.

Fishes of vnwonted shape were taken in England, for they were armed with helmets and shields, in outward shape they resembled, and were like vnto armed knights, sauing that they were far greater in proportion.

Almost the whole towne of S. Edmondsbury was consumed with fire.

The king being lodged in the newe temple at London, there came to him, the foresaid noble men in warlike order, demanding of him to confirme the liberties of king Edwards Lawe and other: the king requiring respite till Easter, was faine to put in sureties the Archbyshop of Canterburie, the Byshop of Ely, and other, to satisfie all men in that behalfe, and then the noble men returned. The king in the Church of Saint Paul at London, at the handes of William Byshop of London, toke on him the signe of the Crosse of the holie Land, by meane thereof to be in the better safegard: the earles of Chester and Darby did the like. In the Easter weeke the noblemen in armor met at Stamford, and after at Barkeley, whither came to them from the king, the Archbyshop of Canterburie, William Marshall with other, to demaund of them what they would haue confirmed, and the nobles deliuered to them a scedule, conteining the olde Lawes and customes, which except the king woulde graunt, they would take the castles of his lands, and so compell him.

After this Robert fitz Walter, and Geffrey de Maundeuill Earle of Eller, and the Earle of Glouceſter, chiefe leaders of the armie, applied all diligence to repaire the gates and walles of the citie, with the stones of the Iewes broken houses. The Tower of London yet held out, though there were fewe within to defende it. When it was noysed that the Barons had London, all (except the Earles of Warren, Arundell, Chester, Pembroke, Ferrers, and Salisburie, and the Barons, William Brewer with other) went to those Barons that were against the king, who called themselues the Armie of God, whereby such a feare came on the king, that hee durst not pæpe out of Windsore Castle: at length he appointed to méete with the Barons in a medowe betwirt Stanes and Windsore, which appointment hee obserued, and

Whiles the Barons returned home, the king being left almost alone, hee sent Pandolph the Legate with other to Rome, to the ende that by the Apostolike authoritie, he might make frustrate the purpose of the Barons. Also hee sent Walter Bishop of Winchester, and Iohn Bishop of Norwich, with other, vnto the Realmes nert adioyning, to procure him souldiers, promising them lands, and large possessions: By meanes of Pandolph, the Pope disanulled the

About the Epiphanie Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, and other, returned from beyonde the ſeas, bringing with them one and fortie ſhips laden with ſouldiers: and about the feaſt of the Purification of our Ladie they beſieged Colcheſter Caſtle, but hearing that the Barons that were at London made haſt to come and ſuccour the Caſtle, they went backe to Saint Edmondeburie. Colcheſter beſieged.

The king with his army was long time on the Scottiſh Seas, and oftimes inuaded the Lands of his Barons in thoſe coaſts, burning their Caſtles, and ſpoyling their goods, in which expedition he went ſo farre, that it was not well knowen what was become of him, inſomuch, that he was noyſed to be dead, and ſecretly buried at Reding. King Iohn inuaded the lands of his Barons.

Geffrey Mandeuill died at London of a wound receiued in tilting: he was buried in the Priorie of the Trinitie at London.

The Pope excommunicated the Barons by their peculiar names, but the Chanons of S. Paul in London, and many other Eccleſiaſticall perſons, with the Barons that remained at London, appealed againſt this ſentence, taking exceptions againſt it, as pronounced by falſe ſuggeſtion. The Barons excommunicated.

The Barons ſent Sayre de Quincy and other, to Philip king of France, earneſtly requeſting him to ſend his ſonne Lewis into this Realme, promiſing to make him king thereof, which the French king refuſed to doe, till the Barons had ſent him foure and twenty pledges of the beſt mens ſons in the kingdome, and then hee ſent them aide. Gwalo the Legate was ſent from the Pope into France, to forbid Lewis to go into England, but his perſwaſions nothing preuailed, wherefore he excommunicated them. Alſo the Abbot of Abingdon, renewed the excommunication againſt the Barons, the citizens of London, and the French, which came to their aide. About Midlent the king beſieged the Caſtle of Colcheſter, and after a few daies it was deliuered to him by the French men that kept it, with condition that they might depart free, with all that belonged to them, and that the Engliſhmen ſhould be ſuffred to depart vpon reaſonable ranſome, notwithſtanding the Engliſhmen he put in ſtreight priſon. After the K. had taken Hidingham caſtle, belonging to Robert de Vere Earle of Orford, he made haſte to beſiege London, but the Londoners ſet open their gates, and were ready to méete with the king ten miles off the city: the king vnderſtanding their boldnes and multitude, he withdrew himſelfe, but Sauaric de Malone, being ſuddainly ſet vppon by the Londoners, loſing many of his men, was ſore beaten and wounded almoſt to death. In the meane time the king hauing knowledge that Lewis meant to come into England, he sent ouer to the French king, the Bishoppe of Winchester, William Marshall the elder, and other, to try if they could perswade the French K. to stay his son from that iourney, but they returned without audience. The king therefore marching along the Sea coast fortified his Castles, and getting pledges of the fiue Ports, gathered a great multitude of ships of Yarmouth, Linne, Dunwich, and other hauens, fraught them with men of warre, and determined to encounter the Frenchmen by Sea, when they came to arriue in England, but by tempest that arose from the North, those shippes were bruised, drowned, or driuen into the South parts of the sea, Lewis hauing al his power ready at Caleis, Grauelyng, and Whitsand, the Northeast winde comming about, he set forward toward England, and with some difficulty, because it was a side winde, he landed at Stonar, in the Isle of Thanet, the 21. daie of May. From which place hee directed his Epistles of title and claime, &c. as are set downe in my larger Hystory. King Iohn being then at Douer, because his soldiers were strangers, durst not go against Lewis, but fledde towards Gilford. Lewis went straight to Canterbury, where he receiued both castle and citie into his subiection, and after all the other castles in Kent, Douer only excepted: then came he to London, where he was honorably receiued of the Nobles and Citizens, who altogether sware fealty to him, and did him homage at Westminster: after this taking the castles of Rygat, Guldford and Fernham, he passed forward to take the king, who as he heard was at Winchester, and had raised vp the Standard of the Dragon, as he had meant to giue battel to Lewis, if he came to offer it. But when king Iohn heard that Lewis approched, he laide downe his Dragon, set fire on foure parts of the citie and fledde. The Citizens quickly quenched the fire and went forth to méete Lewis, receiuing him ioyfully into their Citie, and sware fealtie to him. Here came to him in manner all the Earles and Barons of the Realme: then taking the castle of Odiham, and the Tower of London, he returned into Kent, and the 22. of July he besieged the castle of Douer, and continued the same till the 14. of October: then Hubert de Brugh and Gerard de Scoting, being not able longer to abide the assaults, obtained truce, that they might send to king Iohn for succour. Whilest this siege remained, king Iohn went about the land, consuming with fire and sword the possessions of the Barons.

Douer castle besieged. W. Packington.

Alexander king of Scots hauing subdued to Lewis all Northumberland, sauing Barnard castle, with the Barons of the North, came vnto Canterbury to Lewis, and did him homage, for that which he ought to hold of the king of England, and as he came towards Lewis with a great army, for feare of king Iohns power, as he passed by Barnard castle, which was in the fée of Hugo de Bailioll, in the County of Holywarke folke, he with his Nobles of that countrey went round about the Castle to sée whether it were weake in any place, and assaultable, and a certaine archer within the Castle shot a dart, and smote Eustach de Vesay vpon the forehead, and pierced his braine, so that he died immediatly. About this time it chaunced that the Vicount of Melin a noble man of France, which came with Lewis into Englande lay very sicke in the Citie of London, who when he knew that death approched, called to him certaine of the Barons of England, vnto whom he declared in effect as followeth: I am sorie brethren, for your subuersion, and desolation, whereof you know nothing: for Lewis and sixteene of the Earles and Barons with him haue sworne, that if it be his chance to subdue England, and to be crowned king, he would banish out of the realme for euer, al these which now doe take his part, and persecute king Iohn, as traitors to their king, and will rote all their kinred out of the earth, and to the ende, you shall not doubt hereof to be true, I which now lie here a dying, vnder perill of my soule, affirme this to be true, and that I was one that did sweare the same with Lewis. Now therefore from henceforth prouide for your owne commoditie, and profit, and keep this secret which I haue told you, and when he had said this, he died. The Barons perceiuing what danger they were in by Lewis, who had giuen to the French men the lands and castles which pertained to the Barons, and when anie murmured against Lewis, he cast in their teeth, that they were traitors, &c. they beleeued what the noble man had told them. This did also much increase their heauinesse, that they were euerie day excommunicated, and depriued of all earthly honour, so that they were in great anguish both of body and soule. Wherefore many deuised how to returne into the allegeance of king Iohn. The Vicount of Melin his confession.

The king marched through Norfolke and Suffolke, till he came to Linne, where the Townesmen receiued him with great ioy, and honoured him with large giftes, there hee appointed Sauarike de Malion to bee Captaine, who beganne to fortifie the Towne: but here (as it was saide) filling his belly to much, as he was thereto greatly giuen, he gotte a surfeit, and therewithall fell into a Flixe. Afterward taking his iourney towardes the North, in the water which is called Wilstreme (they saide) hee lost sodainely all the Cartes and chariots, with his treasure, and precious princely vessell, and furniture of his chappell, which he set most by, for the earth opened in the midst of the waues on the marishes, and the whirlepit of the deepe so swallowed vp both men and horses, that none escaped to bring king Iohn tydings. The king with his army going before, escaped very narrowly, and men said, that night he lay at the Abbey of Swinshene, where he remained two daies, and there (as men supposed) he toke such heauines of heart for the losse of his treasure in the washes, that he was taken with an extreame ague, and began to be verie sore sicke, the pernicious greedy eating of peaches, and drinking of new cidar, increased his sicknes, and kindled the heate of the ague the more strongly, notwithstanding in the very breake of the day, with great paine, he went to the castle of Sleford in Lindsey, belonging to the Bish. of Lincolne. There he was let blood (saie some) but so it happened, that about this time, to wit, on the 14. of Octob. Hub. de Burgo & Gerard de Soting, being not able longer to abide ỳ assaults of Lewis this complices, obtained of him truce, that they might send to K. Iohn for succour, which messengers, when they were come to Sleford and had declared their case, that is, that except he would rescue them in the castle of Douer, the same must be deliuered vp to Lewis: his disease with griefe conceiued thereat, increased much, so that on the next morning, he could scantly on horsebacke come to the castle of Newarke, which castle also belonged to the said Bish. of Lincoln, in which place the sicknes so increased in the space of 3. or 4. daies, that he toke the counsell of his Confessor, and receiued the Sacrament at the hands of the Abbot of Crorton, and then he made Henry his eldest sonne, the heire of his kingdome, causing all that were about him to sweare to him, and sent Letters sealed with his own seale, to all the sheriffes of England, & castle keepers, willing them to be attendant and diligent to the said Henry. When these thinges were thus done, ꝑ abbot of Crorton asked him if he should chance to die, where he would haue his body buried: To whom the king answered and said, I commit my soule to God, and my body to S. Vlfkane, and afterward, to witte, in the night which followed next after the feast of S. Luke, he departed this life in the said castle of Newarke, from whom his seruants taking al that was about him fled, not leauing so much of any thing (worth the carriage) as would couer his dead carkase. At the time of king Iohns death, there came to him messengers of certaine Barons of England, to the number of 40. with letters requiring to haue come againe to his peace, & allegeance, but he lying in the extremities of death could not giue attendance to them, he deceased on the nineteenth of October, Anno 1216. when he had raigned 17. yeres, fiue moneths, lacking eight daies, at the age of 51. yéeres. The Constable of the castle, caused the kings body to be bowelled by ꝑ Abbot of the Chanōs at Crorton, which Abbot was expert in Phisicke, and also at that time, the kings Phisition, to the end it might be the more honourably caried, his bowels being powdered, were buried in the Abbey of Crorton, vnto the which Abbey, king Iohn had on his death-bed giuen tenne pound the yéere of good land for euer, his body was honourably conueyed to Worcester, and there buried in the Cathedrall Church, néere vnto the body of Bishop Vlstone.

In Leicestershire were Chanons.
In Staffordshire were Cistercian monks.

Thus haue I set downe the life (though much abridged) and death of king Iohn, after the writing of Rog. Windouer, Rad. Niger, Rad. Cogshall, a nameless Chanon of Barnewell, Mathew Paris, and other, who all liued when the king raigned, and wrote for that time what they sawe, or heard credibly reported. Notwithstanding, I thinke good (as heretofore) to set downe concerning his death, as is reported by a nameless Authour, a continuer of Geffrey Monmouth, in the raigne of Edward the third, and since increased, printed by William Caxton, and therefore called Caxtons Chronicle. This booke (I saie) and other after-commers report, that K. Iohn was poysoned by a Monke of Swinsted abbey in Lincolnshire, for saying that if he might liue halfe a yeare, he would make an halfe penny loafe of bread, worth xx. shillings, &c. as ye may reade in the said common English Chronicle. But to conclude, howsoeuer he died, certaine it is, that he raigned with trouble ynough, as by the premisses may appeare.

Issue of king Iohn.

He had issue two sonnes, Henry and Richard, and three daughters, Isabel the Empresse, Elianor Queene of Scots, and Iane: Geffrey a base sonne gotten on a con-a concubine, Richard and other: hee founded the Abbey of Bowley, in the new forrest in Southamptonshire: the Monasterie of Farendon, and the Monasterie of Hales Owen in Shropshire, he reedified Godstow by Oxford, & Wroxhall by Warwike, and increased the Chappell of Knaresborough, &c.

King Henrie the third.

HENRIE borne at Winchester, the eldest sonne of Iohn, of the age of nine yéeres, began his raigne the nineteenth of October, in the yeare 1216. hee was crowned at Glocester on the 28. day of October, by Peter Bishop of Winchester, and Iocelyne Bishop of Bathe, in the presence of Walo the Legate, Sylvester Bishop of Worcester, William Bishop of Coventrie, and many other Prelates, Isabell the Queene, Ranulph Earle of Chester, William Marshall Earle of Pembroke, William Earle Ferrers, William de la Bruere, Sauaric de Maulion, Iohn Marshall, Philip de Albineto, with the Abbots and other in great number: being crowned by common consent, the Gouernment of the king and kingdome was committed to the Legate, to the Bishoppe of Winchester, and to William Marshall Earle of Pembroke. These thinges being knowen abroade, those that were of the contrary part, toke great indignation thereat: and because there should be no hope left to the new king to prevaile against them, they toke a solemne oath, and swore they would never holde any lande of any heire of king Iohn; but the Legate maintaining the kings part, admonished, prayed, and commanded them that were disobedient to the king, to doe the like as he did, he calling a councell at Bitlow, caused the bishops and prelates to incline to his part: Notwithstanding, Lewis did what he could to the contrary, spoyling their goods, and possessions, yet could he not get one of the Prelates to doe him homage, or feaultie. William Marshall Earle of Pembroke perswaded the Vicountes, Castle kéepers, and other to doe their services to the young king Henry, promising them great gifts, and large possessions, whereby they served king Henry much more faithfully then they did K. Iohn his father, for they thought ý the iniquity of the Father ought not to be imputed vnto the son. This did also greatly incourage them, when they vnderstood that euery sunday Lewis and his complices were excommunicated: Lewis and the Barons being not able to winne Douer Castle, determining therefore to subdue the smaller castles first, they remooued their siege, and came to London where on the first of Nouember, the Tower of London was deliuered to them. From thence Lewis with the Barons went and besieged the Castle of Hartford, from the twelfth of Nouember, till the first of December, on which day the castle was yeelded: about the same time his men had won the Ile of Ely, all, except a fortresse within the same, wherin the kings people were inclosed. The citie of Lincolne also being won againe by his partakers, & the castle besieged, Lewis wēt to Barkhamsted, and besieged the castle there. In time of which siege, there went out of the castle certaine knights and souldiers, who with violence entred vpon the Barons, tooke their Chariots with their carriages, and the standard of William de Mandeuill, and returned into their castle therewithall: but in the end, after long siege, by the kings cõmandement, they yéelded the castle to Lewis on the 20. of December.

On the next morning Lewis came to Saint Albons, and demanded of the Abbot to doe vnto him homage, which the Abbot refused; but Lewis swearing he would set the Abbey on fire, the Abbot after manie threats, by the perswasion of Sayer de Quincy Earle of Wincheſter, fined himselfe and the whole towne for 80. markes of siluer. Which being done, Lewis returned to London: And a truce was taken till the Octaues of the Epiphanie. The feast of Christmas being past, the truce yet continuing, Lewis called his Fauourers vnto a Councell at Cambridge, and the Gouernors of the king called the like councell at Oxford. All these laboured to haue compounded vpon a peace, or at the least to haue prolonged the truce, but when truce could not be prolonged, Lewis besieged the Castle of Hedingham, and at one selfe same time, the saide Castle, and also the Castle of Oxforde were both rendered, and so likewise were the Castles of Norwich and Colchester, for to haue the truce continued till a moneth after Easter: And by this meanes all the East partes of England fell to Lewis.

Castles of Hedingham, Oxford, Norwich and Colchester yeelded to Lewis.

In this meane space, to wit, on the 20. day of January, the knights and souldiers of the Castle of Mount-sorell in Leicester shire went out to robbe, which when the knights and souldiers of Nottingham vnderstood, they met & fought with them, tooke tenne of their knightes, fourteene of their souldiers, slew three of them, and returned.

The 22. of Januarie, Falcatius de Brent, a wicked robber, hauing gathered a number of ruffians out of the Castles of Oxford, Northampton, Bedford, and Windsor, came to the abbey of S. Albons in the euening, spoiled the towne, tooke men, women and children, and bound them verie sore, and slew some, so that the Abbot to saue the abbey and towne from burning, was faine to giue to Falcatius one hundred pound of siluer.

The towne of S. Albons spoiled by Falcatius.

About this time, the ambassadours of Lewis, which were at Rome about his businesse there, did giue him to vnderstand, that except he went out of England, the sentence of excommunication, which Walo the Legate had pronounced against him, should be confirmed by the Pope, vpon Maundie thursday: for this cause therefore truce was taken betweene Lewis and king Henry vntill one moneth after Easter, all things to remaine in state as they then were.

A truce taken.

Philip king of France called his sonne Lewis by speciall commandement, to returne into France, vnto a councell at Lions, to be holden about Pasent, which thing the English men tooke heauily, but hee receiuing an othe on the Euangelists to returne before the truce should be expired, they were somewhat pacified. He being passed ouer, straight way William Earle of Salisburie, William Earle of Arundell, William Earle Warren, and many other, reuolted to the kings side. Also William Marshall reclaimed William his eldest sonne vnto the kings allegiance: and thus became the part of Lewis weakened very much, and the kings power was greatly encreased: And being diuided into diuers places, they besieged many castles at one time, recouering the castles of Marleborow, Fernham, Winchester, Cicester, and other which they demolited.

In the feast of Easter, by procurement of William Marshall the elder, Rainulph Earle of Chester, William Earle of Albemarle, William Earle Ferrers, Robert de Veteriponte, Brienus de insula, William de Entelope, Philip de Mere, Robert de Gangy, Falcatius de Brent, with his Castle keeper and manie other were gathered together, to besiege the Castle of Mount-sorell in Leicester shire, the chiefe keeper of which Castle was named Henrie de Braybrooke, who sent to Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, then at London with the French men, and requiring him to come to their aide: whereupon the saide Earle of Winchester, to whome the Castle belonged, went to Lewis, then lately returned out of France, requiring him to sende some aide to remoue the siege, and so a power was sent out of London 600. knights, and 20000. armed souldiers, they had for captaines, Earle Patricius, the marshal of France; Sayer de Quincy, Robert fitz Walter, and other, who marching forward, spoiled S. Albons, the church at Rudborne, Dunstable, and so forth, toward the north; to raise the siege before Mount-sorell; but Ranulph Earle of Chester, and other left off their siege, and went to the Castle of Nottingham. The Barons aforesaid finding the siege to be remoued, they march toward Lincolne, where Gilbert de Gaunt and other had laide siege: they assaulted the Castle sharpely, but W. Marshall the elder sent thither a great power, such as would bee in this place too long to write, and therefore I referre the same to my larger booke. But to be short, these with much difficultie brake the gates of the Citie of Lincolne, and entring the towne, they boldly smote vpon their enemies, and fought there a cruel battel, wherin the kings part so preuailed the barons, that they slewe and tooke the most part of them: which being done, the kings company fell vpon the earle of Perch, & smote him through the braines, so that he fel downe dead. Thus when the greatest part of the French men were slaine, the residue tooke them to flight, the Barons on the kings side following them that fledde, tooke manie in the chase, amongst the which was taken Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, Henry de Bohune Earle of Hereford, Gilbert de Gaunt whome Lewis had lately made Earle of Lincolne, Robert fitz Walter, Richard de Mountfichet, William de Mowbray, William de Bellocampo, William Manduite, Almaricus de Hacary, Roger de Crasle, William de Caluile, William de Rose, Robert de Resperfle, Radulph Chanduite, and manie more. The kings souldiers spoiled the citie to the bare wals. This battell was fought on the 19. daie of Maie.

On the next morrow there came newes to the king, that the castle of Mount-sorell was forsaken: whereupon the shirife of Nottingham shire was commanded to lay the same flat with the ground.

father, and to Blanch his wife, who forthwith dispatched to him a power: But the coasts by Will. Marshals commandement were kept. And now vpon S. Bartholomews day the Apostle the nauy of Frenchmen were committed to the wicked man Eustach the moyne or monke, to be conducted to the aid of Lewes then being at London. These being entred into the sea, had a faire winde, which draue them vpon the English coast: where when they were sailed a great waie on their voiage, Hubert de Burgo, and they of the ports, espying them to be twentie shippes, and a great number of smaller vessells, and galleies wel armed, they durst not ioine battaile with them on the sea, hauing themselues not past fortie Galleies and Shippes, but hauing the aid of the kings Souldiours, fell stoutlie vpon them on the backe part, made great slaughter of them. The Englishmen also had Galleies with yron hookes, which gowged the Ships of their enimies, whereby they were drowned in a moment, there was a cruell fight betweene them, but the Frenchmen in shorte space were vtterlie vanquished: Eustach le Moyne was slaine by Richarde a bastarde sonne of king Iohn.

Lewes of France his power of French vanquished.

London besieged.

These thinges beeing thus doone, William earle Marshall besieged the Citie of London round about, as wel by water as by land, to to cause them within to yelde: wherupon Lewes beeing in so greate a straite, gaue vnderstanding to the Legate, and to earle Marshall, that he would bee ruled by their Counsell in all thinges vpon condition, that sauing his honour, and auoiding slaunder of his men he might haue peace conuenient: whereupon both parties met, & talked together, neere vnto the towne of Stanes, hard by the riuer of Thamis,

The Bayliffe of Westminster deuising to bee reuenged, proclaimed a game to be at Westminster vpon Lammas day, whervnto the citizens of London repaired, & when they had plaid a while, the Bailie with the men of the Suburbelles harnessed themselues and fell to fighting, that the citizens being soullie wounded, were forced to runne into the Citie, where they rang the common Bell, and assembled the Citizens in great number, and when the matter was declared, euerie man wished to reuenge the fact. The maior of the citie being a wise man and a quiet, willed them first to moue the Abbot of Westminster of the matter, and if hee woulde promise to see amendes made, it were sufficient: But a certaine Citizen named Constantine Fitz Arnulph, willed that all Houses of the Abbot and Bayliffe shoulde be pulled downe, which worde beeing once spoken, the common people issued out of the Citie without ante order, and fought a ciuill bat taile (for Constantine the first) pulled downe manie houses, and oft times with a lowde voyce cryed, in praise of the said Constantine, the ioy of the mountaine, the ioy of the mountaine, God helpe, and the lord Lodowike. A few dates after this tumult, the Abbot of Westminster came to London to Philippe Dawbney, one of the kings councell, to complaine of the iniuries done to him, which the Londoners perceiuing, besette the House about, and toke by violence twelue of the Abbots Horses awaie, cruellie beating of his men, &c. But whiles the foresaid Dawbney, laboured to pacifie the vproze, the Abbot gotte out at a backe doze of the house, and so by a boate on the Thames hardlie escaped, the citizens throwing stones after him in greate abundaunce. Chro. Dun. Abbot of Westminster put to his shifts.

These things being thus done, Hubert de Burgo, Iusticiar of England, with a great army of men came to the tower of London, and sent for the Maior and Aldermen, of whome hee enquired for the principall Authours of this faction. Then Constantine, who was constant in the sedition, was more constant in the answere, affirming that he had done it, and that he had don much lesse then he ought to haue done: The Iusticiar toke him and two other with him, and in that morning early sent them to Falcatius by water, with a great number of armed men, who brought Constantine to the gallowes, and when hee sawe the rope about his neeke, he offered for his life 15000. marks, but that woulde not saue him: so he was hanged with Constantine his nephewe, and Galfride, that proclaimed his proclaimation on the 16. of August. Radul. Cogshall. Great tempests at Barnewell and Chelmesford.

As the Bishop of Ely was giuing orders, at Barnwell in the first weeke of Lent, there rose such a tempest of raine and thunder, that all in the church were readie to fall to the grounde, and such flashes of lightning entred the Church, that ech man thought it had beene set on fire, and such a filthy stench arose withall, that manie of the companie fell sicke thereof, and hardelie escaped death. Likewise whilest the Bishop of London was at Chelmesford giuing orders, a greate tempest of winde and raine annoied such as came thither at that time: whereof it may be gathered (saieth mine author) how highlie God is displeased with such as come to receiue orders, to the end they may liue incontinently, and at ease, of the stipends appointed to Church-men, and the offerings of the faithfull, giuing themselues to banqueting and vncleannes, and so with vncleane and filthie bodies (but more vncleane soules) presume to minister vnto God the author of all puritie and cleanenesse.

An. reg. 15.

King Henry sailed into Britaine, but lost his time to no good effect.

King Henry with a great army sayled into Britaine, where, after hee had ranged the country, and made many spoiles, besieged the City of Naunts, and did nothing but spend great summes of treasure, the earles and Barons also, seeing that Hubert the Justiciar would not suffer them to do any thing against the enemies, they made bāquets & feasts as they were wont to do in England, and tended nothing but eating & drinking: but the poore sort of men, to maintaine themselues, sold all that they had, and beggered themselues for euer.

King Henry set all things in order for the keeping of the countrey of Britaine, and so take shipping, and on the 25. of October landed at Portsmouth, hauing spent and wasted an infinite summe of mony, & giuen ouer vnto death an innumerable number of noble men, or at the least brought them low with sickenesse and extreame pouerty. Sir Macy de Bescile, a French man, was by the king made Shiriffe and Constable of Glocester, wherewith the Barons beeing offended, they chose to bee Sheriffe, and placed there a knight of that countrey, called Sir William Tracy, which Sir William kéeping Court vpon a daie in the Towne of Glocest. Macy the Frenchman, with a number of armed men came sodainly vpon him, drew him to the ground, and so to the castle, and cast him in prison, whereof when the Barons vnderstode, they sent Roger Clifford, and Sir Iohn Gifford with a great power to Glocester, who besieged the castle, brent the bridge, and entred at the last, where they tooke the sayde Macy, with all his companie, and for that a Carpenter from the Castle with a quarrell, had slaine an Esquier of the Barons partie, Sir Iohn Gifforde made the same Carpenter to leape from the toppe of the castle, where through hee was crushed to death. There was a peace concluded betwixt the king and the barons, with these conditions, that Henry, sonne to the king of Almaine, that tooke the Barons part, and was in prison, shoulde bee deliuered, that all the kinges Castles throughout Englande shoulde bee put into the Barons handes, that the prouisions of Oxforde shoulde bee kept, and that all Straungers within a certaine time shoulde depart the lande, those except, whose abode the faithfull persons of the Realme with one assent shoulde accept: lastlie, that the Englishmen borne, and such as were faithfull men to the kingdome, shoulde order and rule the businesse of the Lande vnder the king. But this notwithstanding, certaine knights of the kings part fortified the Castle of Windsore with victuals and armour. Edward the kinges sonne came to Bristowe, where discord rose betwixt his knights and the Townesmen, so that the Townesmen were minded to haue besieged the Castle: which when Edwarde vnderstoode, hee sent for Walter Bysshoppe of Winchester that tooke the Barons part, that in his companie hee mgiht goe to the Court of his father, promising to perswade his father to peace. Hereupon going forth with the Bysshoppe, till they came to Windsore, hee entred the Castle, to the great misliking of the Bysshoppe: but Edwarde shortlie returned, and went to meete Simon earle of Leicester, who with his adherentes were comming to besiege Windsore Castell. Edwarde the kings sonne met with the saide Simon about Kingstone, and offred meanes of peace: but Simon trusting to Bysshoppe Walters counsell, detayned Edward with him, and wouldе not suffer him to departe till the Castell was yelded, they that were within, hauing Libertie to depart whither they wouldе: and the Straungers that minded to passe the Seas, had safe conducts graunted them. Lewlin prince of Wales confederate with earle Simon, in the meane time walked the Countrey of Chester, and the marches of the same, and ouerthrew to the grounde the Castles of Diffard and Gannoke. After this, a Parliament was holden at London, in the which, many that had holde with the earle, went to the kinges part, as Henry of Almaine, Sonne to Richarde king of Romanes, and other. The kings partie beeing encreased, hee went to Douer, and endeuored to haue gotten that castle out of the earles handes, but he trauailed in vaine.

An. reg. 48.

1264 King Henry kept his Christmas at London with the M. the king of Almain and many other great estates.

Lewes king of Francel, throughout procuring of Boniface Archbyshop of Canterburie (who in politike Sermons at Paris, as well at the Friers preachers, as minors, declared the doings betwixt the king of England, and the earle of Leicester) tooke vpon him to make a peace betwixt them: whereupon the king of England, with his sonne Edward, and diuers other of the English nobilitie, came to Paris about the 22. of Januarie, but the earle of Leicester, fearing the the French kinges displeasure for his mothers sake, or some other cause not knowne, staied at home in England and proceeded in his businesse: wherefore Roger Mortimer beganne to destroie the possessions which the earle of Leicester held, against whom the prince of Wales went, and besieged the castle of Kadnore, and brought it to yéeld.

Edward the kings son, after his returne from Paris, about Lent, toke his iourney toward the March, and passing by Oxford, the Burgesses shut vp their gates against him, whereby he was forced to lie at the kings Hall without the towne till the next morow and then departed. The schollers of Oxforde being shut within the Towne, brake vp the gate that leadeth toward Beaumont, for which déede the Maior sent some of them to prison: and not long after, while the schollers were at dinner, the Maior and Commons with banners displayed, thought to haue spoiled the Clearkes ere they had béene aware, but being espied, the schollers ran together, and with bowes and other weapons slew and wounded the Burgesses and Commons, brake vp manie houses, spoiling the goods, and set the houses of the Portriues (William Spicer and Geffrey Hencley) on fire, on the Southside of the towne. Moreouer, because the Maior (Nicolas Kingstone) was a Wintener, they brake vp the Wintrie, dranke the wines, and spoiled them, for the which fact the king caused the Clearks and schollers to bee banished the Vniuersitie.

Edward the kings Sonne toke the Castle of Hate and Huntington, belonging to the earle of Hereford, and the Castle of Brecon being also rendered to him, he deliuered to Roger mortimer to kéepe, with the territories adiacent. Robert Ferrers earle of Darbie (who toke parte with earle Simon) besieged Worcester, and entring by the olde Castell, spoyled the Citizens of their goods, and compelled the Iewes to be christened. The towne of Gloucester, that before was taken by the Barons, was now assailed by Edward the kings sonne, who entred the castle by great force, and in the next morning by meanes of the Bishoppe of Worcester, and Reignolde Abbot of Gloucester, a truce was taken betwixt the Barons in the towne, and the kings sonne in the Castle: but shortlie after the Barons fled, and the Burgesses submitting themselues, were some of them hanged, the residue cast in prison, grieuouslie raunsomed, and the town destroied, from whence the kinges sonne departed, spoyling and wasting the countrey (contrarie to his othe made to the Barons) till he came to Oxforde, where he lodged in the house of the Frier preachers, and ioined his power with the king his father, who was lately come thither to make his offering to Saint Friswide, (not fearing the superstitious opinion, that if anie king entred that towne, the virgin there would be auenged on him.) The king hauing now with him his brother Richarde king of Almaine, his sonne Edward, William de Valence his brother on the mothers side, and Iohn Cumyn of Scotlande, with a multitude of Scottishmen, Iohn de Bailliol Lord of Galloway, Robert le Bruse Lord of Anandale, Roger de Clifford, Philip de Marmion, Iohn de Vallibus, Roger de Laborne, Henry Percy, Philip Basset, Roger de Mortimer, with an armie went and besieged Northampton, and the fourth of Aprill breaking the wal, toke the town, and in it vv. knights bearing banners, Simon Mountfort the

Earle Simon went to London, and from thence to Rochester, which Iohn Earle Warren defended, the bridge and first gate whereof when he had won, being informed that the king was comming towards London, he left the siege and went backe to mete him: but the king turning his waie from London toke the castle of Kenington or Kingston, which was the Earle of Glocesters, and then going to Rochester, chased away some that remained at the siege, but slew many mo: from thence he went to Tonbridge, the castle whereof he toke, and the Countesse of Glocester within it: leauing a garrison there, he went to Winchester, where he receiued them of the 5. ports to his peace, and passing further to Lewis, was receiued into the priory, and his son into the castle, where whiles he remained, the barons writ to him letters, as ye may read in Mathew Paris, and Nicholas Triuet: but they taking no effect, the Barons in armes approched towards Lewis, inuading the kings people that were gone forth for forrage, whereof the King being warned, he goeth forth to mete them with his armie deuided into three sortes: The first was led by Edw. the kings sonne, hauing with him William de Valence Earle of Pembroke, and Iohn de Waren earle of Surrey and Sussex. The second was guided by Richard K. of Almaine with his sonne Henry. The third the K. himselfe had in gouerning. The Barons army was deuided into 4. wards. In the meane time an assault being giuen to the Castle, which was valiantly defended, the Barons withdrew them: whereupon the Lord Edward being greatly incouraged, and hauing gathered his people about him, would haue made a new battell, so that the Barons sued for peace, which by the meanes of the Friers preachers and Minors, was brought to passe, that on the Friday following, the Lordes, Edward and Henry, for their Fathers, of England and Almaine kinges, deliuered themselues to Earle Simon, vpon hope of quietnesse and peace that might bee concluded. On the Saterday the king licenced them that were about him to depart to their houses, and writ vnto them that were in Tonbridge Castle, that they should not molest the Barons, as they returned homewards: but they notwithstanding being in armes, when they heard that the Londoners which were fled from the battell were receiued into Croydon, they hasted thither, & sleying many of them got great spoiles. From thence they went to Brikstow, where they remained till Edward the kings son was deliuered. There was slaine in the battell at Lewes, (which was fought on the 12. of May) about 4500. men. Wherevpon Simon of Leicester, and Gilbert of Glocester strike arose, for that Simon not only kept the king and other as prisoners, but also tooke to himselfe the reuenewes of the kingdome, &c. which should haue béene equally deuided amongst them, so that Gilbert of Glocest. departing, ioined to him in league the noble knights of the marches, whome earle Simon had commanded to auoide the realme, but Ioh. de Waren Earle of Surrey and Sussex, and William de Valence earle of Pembroke, had brought a great power by sea in the West parts of Wales, & arriuing at Pembroke, earle Simon leading the king with him, went to Hereford, where he gathered a great power, to oppresse the said knights: but while the prelates laboured for peace, Edward the K. sonne being in the castle of Hereford is permitted to exercise himselfe on horsebacke in a medow without the city by his kéepers, where after he had wearied diuers horses, and mounting on a fresh appointed for that purpose, he rode quite awaie, and passing the riuer of Wey, with two knights and foure Esquires, was followed harde by his kéepers: but when they were aduised of the standarts of Rog. Mortimer and Roger Clifford comming to his reliefe, they returned, and he escaped to Wigmore. And this chanced in the Whitson wéeke. Lord Edward being thus escaped, gathereth an army, confederateth and submitteth to him the Countries of Hereford, Worcester, Salop, and Chester, with the townes, cities and castles, he also winneth by force the citie of Glouceſter, which Earle Simon had lately fortified, the townesmen fled to the castle, who 15. daies after yéelded it, and departed. The earle of Leicester wan the Castle of Monmouth, and laide it flat with the ground, and entring into the land of the earle of Glocester called Glamorgan, méeting with the prince of Wales comming to his aide, they destroyed all with fire and sword.

Edward the kinges sonne hearing that manie of Earle Simons partakers were come to the Castle of Kenilworth, taking with him the Earle of Glocester, hee departed from Worcester, and came vpon them at a sodaine, when hee tooke the Earle of Oxforde, Sir William Mountchalsie, Sir Adam Newmarch, Sir Walter de Solenle and other: and Simon the sonne of Earle Simon hardly escaped in the Castle. The earle of Leicester hauing the king with him, returned out of South Wales, and on Lammas day came to Kemsey a place of the Bishop of Worcester, and there tarried the next day, Edward the kings sonne returned from Kenilworth to Worcester, whose returne being knowen, Earle Simon departing from Kemsey, by vnhappy chance stayed in the town of Euesham, for on the morrow being the 2. of August, Edward the K. sonne departed from Worcester, passing the riuer neere to the towne called Clive, closed vp the passage betwixt earle Simon and Simon his sonne, who was at Killingworth. In the next morning L. Edward approched néere to Euesham on the one side, & Gilbert earle of Glocest. on the other side, and Roger Mortimer on the two other sides, wherby earle Simon was so enclosed, that he must either fight or yelde: on Fridaie therefore the fift day of August, their armies encountred ech other in a large fielde without the towne, where the Earles part had

Edward did smite round peny, halfe peny, farthing,
The crosse passes the bond of all throughout the ring.
The Kings side was his head, and his name written,
The crosse side, what citie it was in, coyned and smitten.
To poore man, ne to priest, the peny frayses nothing,
Men giue God aye the least, they feast him with a farthing.
A thousand two hundred, foure score yeeres and mo,

common people of the countrey to accept him for their prince, vnlesse he would remaine himselfe in that countrey among them, neither could he bring them to yéeld obedience to any Prince, except he were of their own nation. For the Welchmen hauing experience of the gouernment of the English officers, and knowing that the king would rule the countrey by his deputies, could not abide to haue any Englishman to be their ruler: wherefore oftentimes, vpon the kings motion they answered, that they were contented to take for their Prince any man, whom he would name, so that he were a Welchman, and other answere could he neuer get of them by any meanes. Whereupon, hauing secretly sent for the Q. being then great with childe, caused her to remaine at Carnaruon: and when she was nigh her time of deliuerance, the king being at Rothland, sent for all the Barons and best men of Wales, to come to him to consult concerning the weale publike of their countrey; and when they were come, he deferred the consultation, vntill hee were certified that the Quéene were deliuered of a sonne: Then sending certaine Lordes to the christening, hee called the Welchmen together, declaring vnto them, that whereas they were oftentimes suters vnto him to appoint them a Prince; he now hauing occasion to depart out of the country would name them a prince, if they would allow and obey him whom he should name. To the which they answered, that they would so do, if he would appoint one of their nation. Whereunto the king replied, that he would name one that was borne in Wales, and could speake neuer a word of English, whose life and conuersation no man was able to detect. And when they all had granted, that such a one they would obey, he named his owne son Edward borne in Carnaruon Castle a fewe daies before. When the king hauing the countrey at his will, gaue Lordships and townes in the middest of Wales vnto English Lords, as the Lordship of Wendigh to Henry Lacy Earle of Lincolne: the Lordship of Ruthen to the Lord Reginald Grey, second sonne to Iohn Grey of Wilton, &c.

In this parliament many complaints were made of the oppression of churches and Monasteries, by the Popes Chaplaine named William Testa Archdeacon of Araine in the Church of Couentrie. The same Clearke was forbidden to vse anie moe such extortions, and diuers Statutes were ordained touching religious persons which had their principall houses in other realmes.

There came to this Parliament, sent from the Pope, a Cardinall called Petrus Hispanus, to treate of a marriage betwixt Edward Prince of Wales, and the French kings daughter.

The course of Fleete diue at London sore decaied, which sometime bare ships of small burden to Holborn-bridge, to the great commodity of the citie in that West part. T. Walsingham.

And amongst many other suites made there, Henry Lacy Earle of Lincoln complained, that whereas in times past, the course of water running at London vnder Holborne bridge, and Fleete bridge into the Thamis, had beene of such large breadth and depth, that ten or twelue ships at once with merchandises were wont to come to the foresaide bridge of Fleete, and some of them to Holborne bridge: nowe the same course (by filth of the Tanners and such other) was sore decayed. Also by raysing vp of wharffes, but especially by turning of the water, which they of the newe Temple made to their milles without Baynards Castle, and diuers other perturbations, the saide shippes nowe could not enter as they were wont, and as they ought, wherefore he desired, that the Maior of London with the sheriffes, and certaine discréete Aldermen might be appointed to sée the course of the said water, and that by oth of honest men all the foresaid hindrances might be remoued, and to be made as it was wont of old time, &c. Which was answered and recorded, that Roger le Brabazon, the constable of the tower, with the Maior and Sheriffes are assigned, that taking with them other honest and discréet men, they make diligent search and inquirie, how the said riuer was in olde time, and that they leaue nothing that maie hurt or stoppe it: and to kéepe it in the same state that it was wont to bee.

King Edward remaining all the winter and summer at Carlile, disposed manie things of Scotland at his pleasure: but in the meane time Robert le Bruse going about the Countrey, slewe manie that would not obey him, and he sent with part of his army two of his brethren, Thomas that was a knight, and Alexander a priest, Deane of Glasco, into another part of the Countrey, that they might allure the people vnto them by gentle perswasions, which (by comming of Englishmen vpon them) were taken, ledde to the Iustices, condemned, hanged and headed at Carlile.

Ioane of Acres Countesse of Glocester deceased.

King Edward sent messengers into England, commanding all that ought him seruice to bee readie at Carlile, within three weekes after the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist: but himselfe being vexed with the blondie flixe, hee sent vnto his sonne that hee shoulde come with spéede to heare his last wordes, whome, among other thinges hee did counsell to bee mercifull, iust, and constant in all his wordes and déedes: hee commaunded him not to bee to hastie to take vpon him the Crowne of England, vntill he had reuenged the iniuries done by the Scottes, but rather to staie in those partes, and to cause his fathers bones (being closed in a chest) to be borne about with him, till he had gone thorowe all Scotland and ouercome his aduersaries. He also commaunded him to honour his mother, and loue his two brethren, Thomas earle Marshall, and Edmund Earle of Kent. Moreouer he charged him on his curse, that he should not presume to call home Pierce of Gaueston, by common decrée banished without common fauour: he declared to him also, that he had taken on him the crosse, for the seruice in the holy lande, to the which he had determined to haue gone in person, but troubled with the new and diuers attemptes of Robert le Bruse, he was hindered of his purpose, and was constrained, omitting that businesse, to turne the warre into Scotland. 32000. pound of siluer (said he) I haue prepared for the charges of an hundred knights to go honorably thither with their retinues: because it is not my happe to performe in proper person, what I had intended, let them yet take my heart, and carrie thither, which if they doe, I trust in my God that all things shall prosper with them. I therefore (saith he) doe streightly command thée in paine of my curse, that am thy Father, that the said money be not otherwise spent.

The king also called vnto him Henry Lacy earle of Lincolne, Guy Earle of Warwike, Aymer de Valence Earle of Pembroke, and Robert Clifford Baron, desiring them to be good to his son, and that they should not suffer Pierce of Gaueston to come again into England, to set his sonne in riot, and the seuenth of July he departed this life at Burgh vpon the sands, in the yéere 1307. when he had raigned 34. yéeres, 7. moneths, and odde daies, and was 68. yeeres of age. He was buried at Westminster. W. Packington.

He had issue by his first wife Elianor, daughter to the king of Spaine, fiue sonnes, to wit, Henry, Iohn, and Alfonse that died without issue, Edward that succéeded him in the kingdome, and Henry that died without issue, and tenne daughters, to wit, Elianor Countesse of Barre, Ioane of Acres Countesse of Glocest. Iulian that died yong, Margaret Dutchesse of Brabant, Alice that died yong, Elizabeth Countesse of Hereford, Elizabeth Countesse of Holland, Mary that was a Nunne at Ambresbury, Beatrice that died yong, Blanch that died yong: he had issue by Margaret daughter to Philip king of France his second wife, two sons, to wit, Thomas of Brotharton, and Edmond of Woodstocke Earle of Kent, and one daughter, named Elianor that died yong.

The king gaue vnto Pierce of Gauſton all ſuch gifts and iewels as had bin giuen to him, with the crownes of his father, his anceſtors treaſure, and manie other things, affirming that if he could, he ſhould ſucceed him in the kingdome, calling him Brother, not granting anie thing without his conſent. The Lords therefore enuying him, told the king, that the father of this Pierce was a traitour to the king of France, and was for the ſame executed, and that his mother was burned for a witch, and that the ſaid Pierce was baniſhed for conſenting to his mothers witchcraft, and that hee had now bewitched the K. himſelfe. They beſought the king to heare therefore their petitions, which ſhould be both for his owne honor, and for the wealth of his people.

First, that hee would confirme and vſe ſuch ancient Lawes and cuſtomes,

as are contayned in the Charters of the kings his Predecessors: and for that they woulde graunt him the twentieth part of their goods, and bee his true subiectes.

Secondlie, that he woulde take nothing of anie man, but at the price of the owner, the same to be paid for to the vttermost. 2

Thirdlie, that whatsoeuer was alienated from the crowne, since his fathers death, might be restored thereunto againe. 3

Fourthlie, that hee woulde obserue the oathe hee made before his Father, as of the reuoking of Peter Gaueston, the prosecuting of the Scottish warre, and that all that was amisse shoulde bee amended, least his enemies reioice at it, &c. 4

That Iustice and Iudgement might bee done in the Lande, as well to the Rich, as to the Poore, according to the auncient and olde approoued Lawes and Customes of Englande, and that no man shoulde bee restrayned by the kinges Writte from prosecuting his Right, or to defende himselfe by Laine. 5

Then the king taking counsell of Pierce, Hugh Spencer the Treasurer, the Chancellour and others, hee appoynted to answere the Barons at the parliament on Yocdale. The barons being departed out of London, the city gates were shutte vp and chained, greate watch kept, and Hugh Spencer made Constable of London. The K. with Peter of Gaueston went toward Walling ford Castle with a great companie of souldiers, as well strangers as English, and Hugh Spencer tarryed still at London. The Parliament on Yocdale was kept, the king and Barons being there when they decréed that the same Pierce should be banished the land to depart on the morrowe after Midsommer date, neuer to returne againe. The king gaue him two and thirtie Townes, and so manie castles in Gascoigne, and great summes of money out of his earledome of Cornewall during his life: The king accompanied him to Bristow, sent him into Ireland, assigning him the whole gouernement and reuenues of that countrey.

The king sent for Pierce of Gauestō out of Ireland: he landed at Carnaruon, on the æuen of S. Iohn Baptist, the king mette him at the Castle of Flint with great ioy: and gaue to him the earle of Glocesters sister in marriage, they were maried at Barkhamsted, which caused him again to rise in pride, scorning the nobles of the Realme, and to abuse the king, as before he had done, in conueying the treasure of the realme into forraine countries, amongst the which treasure, he conueied the table and trestles of gold from the treasurie of Westminster, and deliuered them to one Armery of Frisconband to be conueied into Gascoigne. The barons therefore declared to the king, that except he would expel the said Pierce from his company, they would rise against him as against a periured Prince: whereupon by the aduise of Pierce of Gauestō, the king sent for aide into Gascoigne, to the earle of Foys, and the Vicount of Henoy, and they came with three hundred horsemen through Fraunce, but Philippe the French king imprisoned the chiefe, and slewe and hanged the other. Also, the king of England had word from Robert Bruse of Scotland, and from Robert Fitz Thomas of Ireland, that they woulde not take part with the king against his Barons, whereupon the king being wroth, fortified Windsor castle, and began to build towres and other strange things.

Then the king appointed a Parliament at Northampton, determining from thence to passe into Scotland: the Barons came to this parliament well furnished, but the king sent them worde hee woulde not come there, yet at the last he came to Stonie Stratford, whither were sent to him by the Barons, the earles of Warwike and Clare, who requested him to come for his owne profite, and the commodity of the Realme: at length he went in the habite of a squire, and the Barons met him without armor, and in the end they louingly embraced and were made friendes, and the voiage to Scotland was retourned till another time. Michaelmas, the Parliament was holden at London, vnto the which Parliament came Lewes the French kings brother, with the Bysshoppe of Poytoine, from the king of France, to intreat vnitie betwixt the king and his lords: and there were diuers good ordinances made. And once againe, though sore against the kings mind, he caused Pierce to abiure, with condition added by the barons, that if he were found again in any land subiect to the kings dominion, he should be taken as a common enimy, and condemned. This being done, he passed into Flanders, and from thence to other countries, seeking rest, which hee could not find.

Pierce of Gaueston conceiuing an affiance in the fauour of king Edward, and of the yong earle of Gloucester, whose sister he had maried, taking with him many strangers, returned into England, and a little before Christmas came to the kings presence, whom the king, forgetting all oathes and promised pacts, receiued as a heauenlie gift. Pierre of Gaueston returned into England.

King Edward kept his Christmas at Yorke, where Pierce of Gaueston was present with his Dutlandish men, the king reioicing, and beeing in a greate follitie because he had receiued him in safetie, all the court and Queene being sorrowfull, because they sawe the king not verie sounde. The mightie men of the land therefore sought howe they might set an ende to the trouble at hande, for they feared to raise warre, and durst not disquiet the king, yet the perill being weied, they founde that so long as Pierce liued, there coulde be no peace in the kingdome, nor the king to abound in treasure, nor the Queene to enioy the kinges true loue. Thus after they had long considered the perilles past, present, and to come, they determined rather to trie all extremities, then to be despised and set at naught by a stranger, they chose a captaine then for their busines to come, Thomas of Lancaster, noble in lineage, valiaunt in armes, excellent in fame for his maners and iustice, he was son to Edmunde earle of Lancaster, and therfore by inheritance earle of Lancaster, Leicester and Ferrers. In proces of time he married the only daughter of the earle of Lincoln, to wit, Henrie Lacyes daughter, whereupon after the earles decease, of a great man, he was made a greater, for he was earle of Lincoln, and of Salisbury, besides the liberties of Pickering, and the honor of Cockermore, and other great lands in Wales, and the earledome of Artoys in France. 1311

About this time king Edward for his recreation toke the Sea, leauing Peter of Gaueston at Yorke, whereupon the Barons brought their power, and entred the city of Yorke, but Peter fled to Scarborough: then the Barons besieged Scarborough, where they toke him, and committed him to the custody of Aymer de Valence earle of Pembroke, who brought him to the manor of Dedington which is betwixt Oxford and Warwike, and there left him to be kept safe: but the next day in the morning Guy earle of Warwike with a companie of armed men, toke him from thence, and brought him to Warwike castle: after deliberation taken, the earles of Lancaster, of Warwike, and of Hereford, caused in their presence in a place then called Black Lowe, since Gauers heathe, the 19. of Iune his head to be stricken off: his body by the Frier preachers was conueyed to Oxford, and there kept more then two yeares, till the king caused the same to be translated to his manor of Langley, and there in the Friers church (which he had builded) to be buried.

This yeere therefore by consent of the Prelates, and certaine Nobles, Hugh Spencer the sonne was appointed the Kings Chamberlaine in place of Peter of Gauestō, whom they the rather preferred, because they knew the king hated him: neuertheless, not long after, by his great diligence, he brought himselfe into the kings fauour. The father of this Hugh being old, was yet liuing, a knight of great vertue, in counsell wise, in armes valiaunt, whose confusion and shameful end he wanne vnto himselfe by natural loue though disordinate towards his sonne, who was in bodie verie comely, in spirite proud, and in action most wicked, whose couetousnes and ambition, by the disheriting of Widowes and strangers, wrought the death of the Nobles, the fall of the king, with the bitter destruction of himselfe and his father. King Edward gathering a great power, marched towardes Scotland, to breake the siege of Striueling Castle, and lodged himselfe and his people therabout in the fielde on the eeuen of S. Iohn Baptist: neuer afore that time was seene the like preparation, pride and cost in the time of warre, as affirmeth Robert Paston, a Carmelite Frier, being present, and taken of the Scots, which he sorrowfully bewayled in his Heroycall Verse whiles he was prisoner. The first night (saith hee) ye might haue seene the Englishmen bathing themselues in Wine, and casting their gorges: there was crying, chowting, wallaling, and drinking, with other ryoting farre aboue measure. On the other side, yee might haue seene the Scottes quiet still, and close, fasting the eeuen of Saint Iohn Baptist, labouring in loue of the libertie of their Countrey. On the morrowe, the Scottes hauing gotten the most conuenient place in the fielde for victorie, made ditches in the grounde three foote deepe, and the like in breadth, from the right wing of the army, vnto the left, couering the same with weake twigges or Herdles, and againe ouer with the Turfe and grasse, which was not of strength to beare horsemen. The army of the Scottes being deuided into certaine troupes, stoode not farre off from this dike, which was betwixt them and the Englishmen. On the other side, the army of the Englishmen comming out of the West, the sunne rising, casting his beames on their golden Targets, bright helmets, and other armour, gaue such a reflection, as was both wonderfull and terrible to beholde. In the first warde were the light horsemen, and beaute coursers. In the second were the Archers, and other footemen, who were appointed for the chase of the aduersaries. In the third was the king with his Bishoppes, and other Religious, amongst whome was Hugh Spencer. The horsemen of the first front making vppon their enemies, foundered with their fore feete into the ditch, and lay there tumbling, abiding the cruelty of the Scots, who comming vpon them, slew some, and toke a great many rich men for raunsome. Mortimer of Wigmore breaketh out of the Tower.

On Lammas day Roger Mortimer of Wigmore, by making a solemne banquet to sir Stephen Segraue constable of the Tower of London, and the other officers, and giuing to his keepers a sleepe drinke, escaped out of the Tower, breaking through the wall, and comming into the kitchin neere adioyning to the kings lodgings, and getting out of the toppe thereof, came vnto a warde of the Tower, and so with the cordes knit ladder-wise, prepared afore hand by a friend of his, got to another warde, and so with great feare got to the Thamis, and with his helper and two mo of his counsell passed the riuer, and auoiding the high waies came to the Sea, and there finding a shippe at Rochester, he passed ouer into France to the king there, where he liued long, looking when he might be reconciled to the king of England: his vncle Roger being still kept in filthy prison, the space almost of fiue yeares very vncourteously, at length he died, and was buried at Bristowe: for the escape of the yonger Mortimer, the king being sore offended, put sir Stephen Segraue out of his constableship of the tower. About the feast of S. Martin, were the Burgesses of London and of other townes attached by a Clearke, named Thomas Neubigging, who purchased a commission of the king, and by force thereof accused many, obiecting against them, that they had conference with sir Roger Mortimer, maintaining and sustaining him, on the other side the Sea, and that they ayded and counselled him to escape out of the Tower, of which inditements the good people did purge themselues, by all the course of law, before the kings Iustices, whereby that Clearke was compted a wicked man, and imprisoned as a false traytor. The king sent Embassadours to the French king, the Bishops of Winchester and of Norwich, with Iohn of Britaine Earle of Richmond, to take order for the dukedome of Britain, who after long debatings tooke a certaine forme of peace with the king.

1325 King Edward kept his feast of Christmasse at Nottingham very nobly and royally, after that the truce had béene confirmed at Yorke, betwixt the Englishmen and the Scots, by the graue and wise persons of both the realmes.

The Queene sent into France.

King Edward sent the Quéene his wife vnto her brother the French king, to establish the peace, who went ouer with a small company. By her mediation a peace was fully finished, to wit, that the king of England should giue vnto his eldest sonne Edward, the dukedome of Aquitaine, and the earledome of Pontiue, and that the French king should receiue homage of him: whereupon Edward the kings sonne went ouer with a competent household about the feast of S. Mathew, and did homage vnder certaine protestations, to his vncle the French king.

King Edward banished his Queene, and eldest sonne.

Whiles the quéene with her son remained in France longer then the kings pleasure was, and would not come againe without Roger Mortimer and other Nobles that were fledde out of England, and especiallie for the hatred shee bare to the two Hugh Spencers, the king in displeasure banished them both, and all all other that toke their partes: whereupon many fledde ouer the Seas to the Quéene, amongst the which was one, a subtill knight, sir Robert Walkefare, who slaying the Constable of Corffe Castle, brake from thence, where hee had long laine prisoner.

Sir Oliuer Ingham knight, whom the yong duke Edward had made keeper of Aquitaine, gathered a great army, and inuaded the Prince of Anlow (which the French king contrary to couenants, did withholde) and brought it wholie into the dominion of England. Oliuer Ingham. An. reg. 19.

Moreouer, the kings nauy toke 100. shippes of the Normans, and brought them into England, for which cause great hatred grew betwixt the two kings and their realmes.

The quæne perceiuing that the nobles of France were corrupted with gifts sent out of Englande, so that shee could trust none of them, secretly conueyed her selfe and her son to the earle of Heynald, desiring aide of him: who receiued and intreated her very honourably so long as she remained there.

King Edward kept his Christmasse at S. Edmundsbury for afraied of the Quéenes returne & of those exiled persons that were with her, lest they should with a power of Aliens put him downe from his kingly dignitie, therefore he ordeined his Castles as well in Wales as in England, to bee furnished with victuailes, munitions and men: he also let keepe his riuers and coastes of the Sea, whereof the men of the Cinque portes toke the charge to defend. He also commanded, that in euerie Citie, borough, towne corporate, hundred, and wapentake of England muskers should be made, and their men to be exercised in armes, both on horsebacke and on foote, so that they might at all times bee ready when any hue and crie should be made, to pursue the Aliens if any came into England. And to this purpose, he ordained Bikenings or Beacons to be set vp, that the same being fiered might be seene farre off, and thereby the people to be raised. 1326. Castles in England and Wales fortified. Bikenings set vp.

Isabel the Quéene made a marriage betwixt her eldest sonne Edward, and Philip the daughter to William earle of Heynald, and then with her sonne Edward, Edmund of Woodstocke earle of Kent, the kings brother, Roger Mortimer, and many other noble men that fled out of England, and Iohn brother to William Earle of Heynald being captaine, with stipendary knightes, out of Almaine and Heynald, she toke the seas with all her power, which were to the number of two thousand seuen hundred fiftie and seuen men well armed, and arriued at Orewell, or Orwell hauen besides Harwich in Esser, about Michaelmasse, whither immediately the Earle Marshall, the Earle of Leicester, the Bishops of Lincolne, Hereford, and Diuelin, and Ely came, and being ioined to the Quéene, made a great army: the other Bishops specially of Canterbury, ayded her with money. When she had refreshed her army at Saint Edmundsbury, she went forwards pursuing her enemies, whose goods she applied to her owne vse. An. reg. 20. Queene Isabell returned.

The king requested aide of the citizens of London, who made him answere they would with due obedience, honour the king and Quéene, and their sonne, who was lawfull heire to the realme, and that they would shutte their gates a- The king requested aide.

gainſt all forraine Traytours of the Realme: but they woulde not goe out of their citie to fight, except they might (according to their Liberties) returne home againe the ſame date before Sun ſet: which when the king heard, he fortified the Tower of London, and left there his yonger ſonne Iohn of Eltham:

Proclamation by the king.

hee cauſed alſo to bee proclaimed that euerie man ſhould reſiſt them that were arriued, and to inuade them to the vttermoſt of their powers (the Quéene with her ſonne Edward, and the earle of Kent his brother onelie excepted) and whoſoeuer could bring the head of Roger Mortimer, ſhould haue 1000. pound.

The Queenes letters tacked on the croſſe in Cheape.

Proclamation by the queene.

On the other ſide it was proclaimed in the Quéenes behalfe, that all men ſhoulde haue good peace, except the Diſturbers of the Realme, to witte, the Spencers, the Father and the ſonne, Robert Baldocke Biſhop of Norwich, the kings Chancellor, and their fautors: and whoſoeuer did bring to the Quéene the head of Hugh Spencer, ſhould haue 1000. pounds. The citizens of London without reſpect of any, beheaded ſuch as they tooke to be the Quéenes enimies, among the which they beheaded one of their own citizens named Iohn Marſhal becauſe he was familiar with Hugh Spencer the yonger.

Citizens of London tooke part with the Queene.

Biſhop of Excetter beheaded.

They tooke alſo maiſter Walter Stapleton Biſhoppe of Excetter, and on the fiftéenth date of October beheaded him, and two of his ſeruants, a ſquire and a yeoman named William Atwall, and Iohn of Padington at the Standerde in Cheape, becauſe (as the ſaying was) hee had gathered a great army to withſtand the Quéene: they did alſo wreſt the kéeyes of the Tower of London out of the Conſtables hands, and deliuered all the priſoners.

The Ile of Lunday.

The king, Hugh Spencer the yonger, and Robert Baldocke, determined to flée into the Ile of Londay, which is in the mouth of the riuer Seuerne, two miles in length euerie waie, abounding with paſture grounds, and oates, verie pleaſant, it bringeth forth Conies verie plentifull, it hath Pigeons and other fowles, which Alexander Necham calleth Ganimedes Birdes, hauing greate neſtes. Alſo it miniſtreth to the inhabitantes freſh ſpringing waters flowing out of Fountaines, although it be on euerie ſide enuironed with the ſalt Sea: it hath onelie one entrance into it, in the which two men together can ſcarce goe in a front; on all the other partes, there is an high hanging ouer of a great rocke, which letteth the paſſage to this Iland as we haue ſaide: it aboundeth altogether with victuailes, and is verie full of wines, oile, hony, corne, bragget, ſalt-fiſh, fleſh, and ſea coale.

Tho. de la More. Ile of Londay deſcribed. A. Necham.

The king beeing deſirous to ſaile thither, a contrarie winde did altogether withſtand him, whereupon hee ſcarce auoiding the cruell tempeſts of the ſeas, arriued at Glamorgan, and went to the Abbey of Neth, where, truſting too much to the promiſes of the Welſhmen, he did priuilie lurke.

The Quéene being now of great power vnder her ſonnes banner (perſecuting his father) commanded the hoſte to go forward in purſuing the king, till at length they were come to Oxford; where, before the whole Vniuerſitie, the Quéene, the yong Duke of Aquitaine, Roger Mortimer, and other noblemen and ſouldiours, the chiefe deuiſer of ſo wicked a diſſenſion named Adam de Orleton Biſhop of Hereford, made a publike ſermon touching the Quéenes comming, and cauſe of the army, taking for his Theame, My head grieueth mee, Quéene Iſabel came to Oxford.

which authoritie he brought to such a question, that a vaine and slouthfull head, ought necessarily to bee taken awaie from the administration of a kingdome, neither ought it to be bound with any hurtfull bands of an hypocrite, &c.

After this the queene with her people came to Glouceſter, from whence, ſhe went vnto Briſtowe, where Hugh Spencer the elder committed himſelfe and all his vnto the mercie of the angrie and outragious woman, who commanded the earle to be bound, and without question or answere to bee drawen and hanged in his armour, taken downe alive and bowelled, his bowelles burned, then his head ſmitten off, and his bodie hanged vp againe, and after foure daies to be cut all to peeces and caſt to dogges to be eaten, but his head was ſent to Wincheſter. The queene went to Hereford. The K. with Robert Baldock, and Simon de Reding being taken on the ſirteenth of November, was committed to the cuſtody of Hen. earle of Lancaſter, who brought him to Monmouth, to Ledbery, and ſo to Kenilworth caſtle, where he remained the ſpace of one winter, ordered for his diet no otherwiſe then a king.

King Edward taken.

The queene being at Hereforde, Edmund earle of Arundell, Iohn Daniell, and Thomas Mochelden were beheaded. Afterward Hugh Spencer the ſonne Earle of Glouceſter, was by certaine Welſhmen, brought bounde before the queene, and without ſentence or iudgement, was drawne, and hanged on a gallowes thirtie foote high, and after beheaded and quartered on the foure and twentieth day of November, whoſe head was ſent to London bridge, his quarters to foure partes of the Realme. Simon Reding was drawne and hanged on the ſame gallowes, but tenne foote lower: Robert Baldócke, after manie opprobrious words was brought to the Biſhop of Herefords priſon, where hee liued miſerablie vntill the Purification, and then he was remoued to London, and caſt into Newgate, where he was ſo hardly dealt with, that ſhortly after he died there.

Theſe thinges being done, the queene with her ſonne Edwarde, Roger Mortimer, and other, went to Wallingford Caſtle, a little before Chriſtmas, and before the Twelfth day they came to London, where the queene with much ioy & great rewards was receiued: for al the nobility of the realme did aſſemble there being firſt ſummoned to come to the Parliament, to bee holden the morrowe after the ſaide feaſt of the Epiphanie, where they all iudged that the olde king was not worthie to beare the crowne, but for diuers cauſes was to be depoſed: And that his eldeſt ſon Edward was to be choſen king with one whole conſent, which conſequentlie was done, and the election openlie in Weſtminſter pronounced. 1327

The Archbyſhoppe of Canterburie did conſent to the election, as all other the Byſhoppes did the like: whereupon the Archbyſhoppe aſcending into the Pulpit, preached a Sermon, taking for his Theame, Vox Populi, Vox Dei, exhorting all the people to praie vnto the king of kinges for the king they had elected. The Sermon being ended, and the people departed, as ſoone as the queene vnderſtode that her ſonne was elected king, and her huſband depoſed, ſhe ſeemed to be full of ſorrow, as it were almoſt beſides her wits; her ſon alſo lamented his mothers heauines, and ſware, that againſt his fathers will he woulde neuer take the Crowne. Therefore by common decree on the behalfe of the whole Realme it was ordained, that three Bishops, two Earles, Henry of Leicester, and Iohn earle Waren, 2. abbots, Glastenbury and Dor, two barons, Roger Grey, and Hugh Courtney, two Iustices, Sir Geffrey Scroope, and Iohn de Stanthour, two Barons of the Portes, foure Burgesses of London, 4. knights for the communaltie of the land, &c. should be sent to the king being in Kenilworth castle, where they ordained as followeth: Iohn Stratford bishop of Winchester, Adam de Arleton bishop of Hereford, and Henry Bythop of Lincolne were sent.

The bishop of Winchester and the bishop of Lincolne went before the rest, and talked secretly with the king, together with his Keeper the Earle of Leicester, these three craftily compassed him, counselling him to make resignation of the Crowne to his eldest sonne, promising him no lesse honor and renowne after the deposition of his royall dignitie, then his princelie estate was wont to haue of all men before. They added also, what a great reward it woulde bee at the hands of GOD, for the peace and quietnes of his subiects, for him to refuse the gouernement of a temporall kingdome. In the other part they threatned him, that if he would not make resignation, the people withdrawing their homage and obedience, faith and friendship from him, his sonnes also being forsaken, they would crowne another king, none of the royall blood. With these and other promises and threates, the king (not without sobbes and teares) agréed to the aduertisements of the Bythops. Finallie, that mischieuous Embassadour Adam de Orleton Bishop of Hereford, brought to the castell, wherein the king was shut vp, the kings other enimies, whome he placed orderlie according to their dignities in the kinges chamber, reseruing vnto himselfe the thinges which hee had sought long time before. At length the king comming forth of his secrete Chamber, beeing clothed in a mourning gowne, shewing himselfe to his seruants, knowing the businesse, for which they came, for verie sorrow, beeing as it were, distraught of his wittes, sodainelie swouned, the earle of Leicester, and the Bishop of Winchester did take him vp, being almost dead, and being called to his senses, Adam de Orleton Bythoppe of Hereforde declaring the cause of the messengers comming, did adde, that the king should make resignation of the Crowne and realme to his eldest sonne, or else, after that himselfe was refused, hee shoulde suffer them to chuse to their king another fitter man, whome they thought good for the defence of the kingdome.

King Edward resigneth the crowne.

The king hearing this, with much mourning aunsweared, that hee was verie sorie, that the Commons had conceiued such wrath and indignation against him, that they disdained to bee gouerned vnder his rule, for the which hee asked them forgiuenesse, and finallie added, that hee would be very glad, if they would receiue his sonne to be their king. This resignation was made on the fiue and twentieth daie of Januarie, in the yéere of Christ, after the accompt of the Historiographers (who beganne their yeere at Christmas) 1327. after the accompt of the Church of Englande 1326. And forthwith in this castle, those messengers did renounce (as touching the realme) all homages and duties due to Edw. of Carnaruan late king of England by the hand of William

Trussell

Trussell knight, be in presence of the aforesaid Lords, had these words following. Unto thee, O king, I William Trussell, in the name of all men of this land of England, and procurator of this parliament resigne to thée Edwarde the homage that was made to thée sometime, and from this time forth depriue thee of all kinglie power, and I shall neuer be attendant vnto thée as king after this time. Then Thomas Blunt knight and Steward of the kings houshold, by the breaking of the Rod, resigned his office, and shewed that the kings houshelde had frée liberty to depart.

After this the messengers returned to the parliament at London, declaring the resignation that was made, and the kings answere more fully then it was made. The Commons of the realme despising old things, willinglie receiued Edward of Windsore eldest sonne to Edward of Carnaruan. Also such a great dowrie was assigned to Quéene Isabell, that scarce the thirde part of the reuenues of the crowne were left for her son, and his wife quéene Philip. Moreouer, Quéene Isabell, the bishop of Hereford, and Roger Mortimer did appoint for expences to Edward of Carnaruan 100. marks the moneth.

This Edward of Carnaruan, now depriued of his royall Crowne and dignity remained with Henry earle of Leicester his kinsman, lacking nothing but libertie, where hee beeing shut vp, ledde his life, as if hee had béene a Monke. But the fierce and cruell woman being troubled with manie thinges, taking counsell of her wicked Schoolemaster Adam de Orleton Bishop of Hereforde, she had an answere of him, which did not gréeue her a little, that was, that the Earle of Leicester did take pittie vpon Edwarde his cousin. Moreouer, there was talke throughout the land, that there were couenantes made amongst manie, to take king Edwarde by force out of the castle of Kenilworth, to the which one frier Preacher, named Thomas Dunhed, and one Clearke were assenting, for which cause he and other were imprisoned at Yorke. It was therefore decréed by the cruell woman the Quéene, through the subtill deuise of her said Schoolemaster, that Thomas of Gorney, and Iohn Maltrauers knightes, hauing receiued him from the kéeping of the earle of Leicester, shoulde carry Edwarde the olde king about whither they woulde, so that none of his well willers should haue accesse vnto him, or vnderstand where hee made anie long abode.

And to these two wicked Traitors, authoritie was giuen by the highest sort, that into what soeuer part of the kingdome they bent themselues, that all gouernours and kéepers of the Castles shoulde suffer them to enioie their offices and Romes during their pleasure, vpon paine of forfeiture of goods, landes, and life, if anie shoulde denie them. By meanes of which authoritie Henry earle of Leicester, through commandement of king Edwarde the third, deliuered the olde king by Indenture to Sir Thomas Barkeley, and Sir Iohn Maltrauers, and they brought him from Kenilworth, to the Castle of Corffe, then to Bristow, where for a season he was kept shutte vp in the Castell, vntill it was vndersode by certaine burgesses of the towne, who for his deliuerance conueied themselues ouer sea. Wherefore in a dark night, the kéepers of Edward conuey him thence to Barkeley.

Wilteries of Edward the ſecond.

Theſe tormentors of Edward exerciſed towards him manie cruelties, vnto whome it was not permitted to ride, vnleſſe it were by night, neither to ſee anie man, or to be ſeene of anie. When he rode, they forced him to bee bareheaded: when he would ſleepe, they would not ſuffer him, neither when hee was hungry would they giue him ſuch meates as he deſired, but ſuch as he loathed: euerie word that he ſpake, was contraried by them, who gaue it out moſt ſlanderouſly, that he was madde. And ſhortly to ſpeake, in all matters they were quite contrary to his will, that either by colde, watching, or vnwholeſome meates, for melancholy, by ſome infirmitie he might languiſh and die. But this man being by nature ſtrong to ſuffer paines, and patient thorow Gods grace to abide all griefes, hee endured all the deuiſes of his enemies, for as touching poyſons, which they gaue him often to drinke, by the benefite of nature he diſpatched away.

Edward the ſecond crowned with hay.

Theſe Champions bring Edward towardes Barkeley, being guarded with a rabble of hel-hounds, along by the Grange belonging to the Caſtle of Briſtowe, where that wicked man Gorney, making a crowne of hay, put it on his head, and the ſouldiours that were preſent, ſcoffed, and mocked him beyond all meaſure, ſaying, Haile king, anaunt ſir king, making a kinde of noiſe with their mouthes, as though they had farted: they feared to be met of anie that ſhould knowe Edward, they bent their iourney therefore towardes the leſte hand, riding along ouer the Marſh grounds, lying by the riuer of Seuerne. Moreouer, deuiſing to diſfigure him that hee might not bee knowne, they determine for to ſhaue as well the haire of his head, as alſo of his beard: wherefore, as in their iourny they trauailed by a little water which ranne in a ditch, they commanded him to light from his horſe to be ſhaued, to whome, being ſet on a moale hill, a Barbar came vnto him with a baſen of colde water taken out of the ditch, to ſhaue him withall, ſaying vnto the king, that that water ſhould ſerue for that time. To whome Edward anſwered, that would they, nould they, he would haue warme water for his beard; and, to the end that he might keepe his promiſe, he began to weepe, and to ſhed teares plentifully: At length they came to Barkley Caſtle, where Edward was ſhut vp cloſe like an anchor. Iſabell his wife taking it grieuouſly that her husbands life (which ſhe deadly hated) was prolonged, made her complaint to her Scholemaiſter Adam de Orleton, fayning that ſhe had certaine dreames, the interpretation whereof ſhe miſliked, which if they were true, ſhe feared leſt, that if her husband be at anie time reſtored to his olde dignitie, that hee would burne her for a Traytor, or condemne her to perpetuall bondage. In like ſort the Biſhop being guiltie in his owne conſcience ſtode in like feare. The like feare alſo ſtroke the hearts of other for the ſame offence: wherefore it ſeemed good to many of great dignitie and bloud, as well ſpirituall as temporall, both men and women, that all ſuch feare ſhould bee taken away, deſiring his death: whereupon there were letters colourably written to the keepers of Edward, greatly blaming them, for looking ſo tenderly to the king, ſuffering him to haue ſuch libertie, and nouriſhing him ſo delicately.

Moreouer, there is a priuie motion made vnto them, but yet in ſuch ſorte,

as it might ſeeme halfe done, that the death of Edward would not bee miſliking vnto them, whether it were naturall or violent. And in this point, the great deceit of Sophiſters ſtode in force, ſet downe by the Biſhop who wrote thus:

Eduardum occidere nolite timere bonum eſt.
Kill Edward doe not feare is a good thing.

Or thus:

To ſeeke to ſhead King Edwards bloud
Refuſe to feare I count it good.

Which ſophiſticall ſaying is to be reſolued into two propoſitions, whereof the firſt conſiſting of three words, to wit, Eduardum occidere nolite, doe not kill Edward, and the ſecond of other three, that is, timere bonum eſt, feare is a good thing, do ſeeme to perſwade ſubtilly from murthering of the king: but the receiuers of theſe letters, not ignorant of the writing, changed the meaning therof to this ſenſe, Eduardum occidere nolite timere, to kill Edward doe not feare: and afterwards theſe wordes, bonum eſt, it is good, ſo that they being guiltie, turned a good ſaying into euill.

The Biſhop being thus determinately purpoſed touching the death of Edward, and warily prouiding for himſelfe, if by any chance he ſhould be accuſed thereof, craftely worketh that the authoritie which he gaue by writing, might ſeeme to be taken expreſſely contrary to his meaning, by reaſon of accenting and pointing of the ſame.

To conclude, the murtherers of Edward hoping to haue founde both Iſabel and the Biſhoppe to be their truſtie friendes, they found them earneſt perſecutours of their enterpriſe, quite denying whatſoeuer they had deuiſed againſt Edward, yea, they were greatly buſied in deuiſing moſt cruell death for them, ſo that the murtherers being quite diſmayed, wiſt not what to doe: but ſhewed the Letters of Iſabell, the Biſhoppe, and other conſpiratours, being confirmed with their owne handes and ſeales, which the Biſhoppe refuſed not, but confeſſed to be his and others, but conſtrued them to an other ſenſe, accuſing them to be falſe interpreters of his Letters, and of his owne authoritie threatned them, vntill hee forced them to runne away. Thus much touching the Letters.

Now when king Edward was brought vnto the Caſtle aforeſaide, hee was courteouſly receiued by Thomas Barkeley then Lorde of the fee, who was allowed 100. ſhillings the day for the time: But after the tormentors had receiued their letters of gouernment ouer the Caſtle, the ſaid Thomas is commanded to vſe no familiaritie with Edward: therefore Thomas Barkeley with heauie chéere departeth thence to other his dwelling places: And Edwards perſecution continuing to his death, beganne to take effect. For after this he was ſhut vp in a cloſe chamber, where, with the ſtench of dead carkaſſes, laide in a Cellar vnder him, he was miſerably tormented many daies together, in ſuch ſort, that he was well nigh ſuffocated therewith. And that paine was almoſt intollerable vnto him, It appeareth by the complaint he made on a certaine day at the chamber window, certaine carpenters then working on ỹ right side therof, hearing the same. But those tyrants perceiuing that this terrible stench was not of a sufficient force to cause the death of this valiant man Edwarde, one night being the 22. of September, they came rushing in vpon him sodainlie, as he laie in his bed, with great and beauie featherbeds, beeing in weight as much as 15. strong men coulde beare, wherewith they oppressed and strangled him by smothering. Into whome also they thrust a plummers sodring yron, being made red hot, vp into his bowelles, through a certaine Instrument like to the end of a Trumpet or glisser pipe, put in at the fundament, burning thereby his inward parts, prouiding thereby least anie wound being founde in the kings bodie, might cause his tormenters to answeare for committing open treason, and therefore suffer iust punishment. In this sort was this stoute knight oppressed, crying out with a lowd voice, so that many as well within the castle, as without heard it, perceiuing it to be ỹ crie of one that suffred violent death, which caused mante of Barkley, and also of the castle (as themselues affirmed) to take compassion therof, and to praie for the soule of him that was then departing the world. And this was the ende of Edwarde of Carnaruan, being betraied as is aforesaid: but to colour the matter that they might seeme guiltlesse in this case, Isabel and the bishop of Hereford laboured to cleare themselues by banishing and outlawing of Thomas Gorney, and Iohn Maltrauers, laying as it were all the fault vpon them.

King Edward murdered.

Abt this time flor. Nich. de Lyra he writ Postils on ye Scripture was born at Lyra in Normandy of Iewish Parents & afterwds a Franciscan at Vernevil

This Thomas Gorney flying to Parisis, and there lying hid priuilie the space of three yéers, was at length espied and taken, and as he was brought towards England, there to haue receiued iust and worthy punishment for his deserts, he was beheaded on the sea, fearing that if he had béene brought into England, he would haue accused diuers other great personages. The other, to wit, Ioh. Maltrauers, liuing in great contrition and repentance, spent a long time in Dutchland. Thus far out of Thomas de la More, a worshipfull knight, that then liued and wrote in the French tongue what he saw with his eies, or hearde credible reported, by them that saw, and some that were actors. All which was (at the said sir Tho. de la Mores request) translated, and more orderlie penned in the Latine tong, by Walter Baker, alias Swinborne, chanon of Osney besides Oxford.

Now to conclude this historie, of the raigne and end of king Edwarde the second, called of Carnaruan, for that he was borne there: he was deposed on the 25. of January, in the yére of Christ 1326. when he had raigned 19. yéres, sir moneths and od daies, and was murdered on the 21. of September next following, being the feast of S. Mathew the Apostle, in the yeare of Christ 1327. whose death was not published till after the feast of all Saints, and he was buried at Glocester on the feast daie of S. Thomas the Apostle, or 21. of December. He had issue by Isabell his wife, Edward, which was elected king, and to whome her resigned in his life: Iohn of Eltham earle of Cornewall, that died at the towne of S. Iohn in Scotland without issue: Ioane of the Towre Quéene of the Scots and Elianor Countesse of Gueldar, that died yong.

King

King Edward the third.

EDward the third borne at Windsor, about the age of fourteene yeeres, after the deposing of his Father, began his raigne the 25. day of January, in the yeere of our Lord 1326. after the account of the Church of England. He was crowned at Westminster, on the first day of February, by Walter Reignalds Archbishop of Canterburie. This Prince was endued with passing beauty and fauour, of wit prouident, circumspect, and gentle of nature: of excellent modestie and temperance. He aduanced such persons to dignities, as did most excell other in innocencie of life. In feats of armes he was very expert, as the noble enterprises by him atchieued doe well declare. At the beginning of his raigne, he was chiefly ordered by his mother Isabel, vnto whom was assigned so great a dowrie, that the third part of the kingdome did scantly remaine to her sonne. Ann. reg. 1. Tho. de la More. Gual. Baker of Swinbrooke.

The inhabitants of the towne of Burie in Suffolke, assembled themselues in warlike manner on S. Lukes day last before passed, in the twentieth yeere of Edward the second, and besieged the abbey of Burie, brent the gates, beat and wounded the Monks, bare out of the abby all the gold, siluer, ornaments, bookes, Charters, and other writings, with the assay of their coine, stampes, and all other things pertaining to their Mint: and all other goods, as Brasse, Pewter, Iron, Lead, &c. They also brent many houses about the abbey, and in the towne, pertaining to the Abbot, with his manors in Berton, Packenham, Rugham, Oldhaw, Hernigesbury, Newtō, Whipsted, Weekle, Riseby, Ingham, Ferneham, Redwell, Haberdon, and others, with all the corne in the same manors, & drone away the horses, oxen, kine, swine, sheepe, &c. They drew the Monks out of their Abbey and put them in prisons, & after brought them againe to their Chapter house, where they forced them to search Charters at their pleasure, &c. For the which facts, the malefactors were this yeere by vertue of the kings commission directed to Thomas Earle of Norffolke, Marshall of England, Thomas Bardolfe, and others, apprehended and conuicted: nineteene of them were hanged, and one pressed to death. After this, the whole inhabitants of the Towne, for that they had not stayed the malefactors of their enterprise in the beginning (as they might haue done) were amerced to pay the Abbot toward his dammages 140000. pound. Neuertheless, the Abbot and Couent at the Kings request (who was there present with his Nobilitie) forgaue and remitted to them 122333. pound sixe shillings eight pence of the summe: and for the rest vsed such fauour, that if they truely payd 2000. markes in twentie yeeres following, and obserued their couenants for good order and quietnesse, they forgaue them all the rest. Regist. of Burie. Joh. Prigton. The Abbey of Burg spoiled. 1327. Commons of Burg executed. Burg amerced.

About this time, the like stirre was made against the Monkes of Canterburie: whereof I find recorded as followeth. Record. Eccles. Christi Cantua.

King Edward preparing an army into Scotland, commanded the Bailifes and Citizens of Canterburie, to furnish him twelue horsemen, and send them to Newcastle, toward which charge, the citizens required aid of the Monks: who answered them, that without the assent of the king and their archbishop, they would not agree therunto, for so much as the kings of England had founded their Church in free and perpetuall almes. Whereupon, William Chilham Bayliffe, and many Commons of the citie, assembled themselues in the Preaching Friers Churchyard, conspired and sware against the Monkes, as followeth.

1 That they would ouerthrow the pentises, windowes, and mine, belonging to the Monkes.

2 That no Citizen should dwell in any house belonging to the Monkes.

3 That all rents belonging to the Monkes of Canterburie should be gathered to the vse of the Commons.

4 That no man should send or sell to the Monkes any victuals.

5 That they should sell all the horses and beasts that came into the citie with carriage to the Monkes.

6 That all such Monkes as came forth of their house should be spoiled of their garments.

7 That a trench should be cast, to stoppe all men from going in or comming out.

8 That euery Pilgrime should at his entring, sweare that he should make no offering.

9 Also, that euery of those commons aforesaid should weare on their finger a ring of gold of those that belonged to Thomas Becket.

Sir Iohn the Earles brother of Henault, came to helpe Edward the third against the Scots, with fiue hundred men of armes: which Henawders and the Englishmen fell out by chaunce on Trinitie Sunday at Yorke, where eightie of the Lincolnshire men were slaine, and much of the citie of Yorke was burned: and the Englishmen slaine were buried vnder a stone in Saint Clements Churchyard in Fosegate.

This yere died Charles king of Fraunce the third brother, which was brother to the Ladie Isabel Quéene of England, mother to king Edward the third: by whose death the succession of the kingdome of Fraunce came to the said Edward, but it was vsurped and possessed by Philip de Valoys vncle to the said Charles, who did intrude himselfe by force. An. reg. 2.

Edward the third maried. King Edward married Philip daughter to William Earle of Holland and Henault, at Yorke the fiue and twentieth of Februarie: shee was sisters daughter to Philip de Valoys aforesaid.

A Parliament was holden at Noꝛth-hampton, in which a shamefull peace was made betwirt the Englishmen and Scots, so that Dauid the sonne of Robert Bruse, scarse seuen yéeres old, maried Ioane of the Tower king Edwards sister, at Berwike the twelfth of July. Also the king made the Scots charters, the tenour whereof was vnknowne to the Englishmen: but all was done as it pleased the old Quéene, Roger Mortimer, and Iames Dowglas. The Scots made many taunting rimes against the Englishmen, foꝛ the fond disguised apparell by them at that time vsed: amongst the which this was fastened vpon the Church doꝛes of Saint Peter toward Stangate:

In a Parliament at Salisburie, the king made thrée Earles, Iohn of Eltham his brother Earle of Cornewall, Roger Mortimer Earle of the March, and Iames Butler of Ireland Earle of Dꝛmond. From this Parliament the Earle of Lancaster, the Loꝛd Wake, Henrie Beamond, Earle Marshall, and other noble men did absent themselues, not being far off from thence in armoꝛ, foꝛ the which the king was highly displeased: notwithstanding in Sommer following, they submitted themselues vnto the kings mercy, sée king his fauoꝛ.

Certaine men of this land, to the intent to trie what friends they had in England, craftily deuised that Edward the second king of England was aliue in the Castle of Coꝛffe, but not to be séene in the day time, and theꝛefoꝛe they vsed many nights to make shewes, & masking with dancing vpon the towꝛes and walles of the Castle, which being perceiued by people of the countrey, it was thought there had béen some great king vnto whome they did these great solemnities: this rumoꝛ was spꝛed ouer all England, to wit, that the old king was aliue: whence it came to passe, that the Earle of Kent sent thither a fryer pꝛeacher, to try the truth of the matter, who (as it was thought) hauing coꝛrupted the poꝛter of the castle with rewards, is let in, where he lay all the day in the poꝛters lodge very close: and when night was come, he was willed to put on the habit of a Lay man, and then was bꝛought into the hall, where he saw (as he thought) Edward the father of the king sitting royally at supper, with great maiestie. This Fryer being thus perswaded, returned againe to the Earle of Kent, and repoꝛted as he thought, what he saw: whereupon the Earle said and affirmed with an oath, that he would endeauoꝛ by all the meanes he could to deliuer his brother from pꝛison.

the said Earle of Kent, and many other noblemen and religious persons, to wit, the prouincials of the white Carmelite Fryers, and of the blacke preaching Friers, and Frier Richard Wilton were accused of conspiracie, touching (as it was said) the deliuerie of the Kings father: which matter although it were but deuised fantasie and a mere lye, yet the said Earle for certaine confessions which he made, and for certaine letters which were found about him, was there beheaded. The other, to wit, the prouincials of the Predicants and Carmelites, were banished: but the bishop of London was set at libertie. Robert de Taunton priest, and some certaine Carmelite Friers and Predicants, were condemned to perpetuall prison. The death of the said Earle was the lesse lamented, because his family and seruants had aboue measure afflicted the Commons, in taking vp things (as they trauailed) at the kings price, paying nothing or very little for it.

An. reg. 3.

There was a Parliament holden at Nottingham, where Roger Mortimer was in such glory and honour, that it was without all comparison. No man durst name him any other than Earle of March: a greater route of men waited at his heeles, than on the Kings person: he would suffer the king to rise to him, and would walke with the King equally, step by step, and cheeke by cheeke, neuer preferring the king, but would go formost himselfe with his officers: he greatly rebuked the Earle of Lancaster, cousin to the King, for that without his consent he appointed certain lodgings for noble mē in the town, demanding who made him so bold, to take vp lodgings so nigh vnto the quēn: with which words the Constable being greatly feared, appointed lodging for the Earle of Lancaster one myle out of the towne: and like wise were lodged the Earle of Hereford, Iohn de Bohune of Essex, high Constable of England, and others. By which meanes, a contention rose among the Noblemen, and great murmuring among the common people, who said, that Roger Mortimer the Quēnes Paragon, and the Kings Master, sought all the means he could to destroy the Kings blood, and to vsurpe the Regall Maiestie: which report troubled much the kings friends, to wit, William Mountacute, and other, who for the safegard of the King, sware themselues to be true to his person, and drew vnto them Robert de Holland, who had of long time bēen chiefe kēper of the castle, vnto whome all secret corners of the same were knowne. Then vpon a certaine night, the King lying without the castle, both he & his friends were brought by torch-light through a secret way vnder ground, beginning far off from the said castle, till they came euen to the Quēns chamber, which they by chaunce found open: they therfore being armed with naked swords in their hands, went forwards, leauing the king also armed without the doore of the Chamber, least ỹ his mother should espie him: they which entred in, slew Hugh Turpinton knight, who resisted them, Master Iohn Neuell of Horneby giuing him his deadly wound. From thence, they went toward the Quēne mother, whome they found with the Earle of March readie to haue gone to bedde: and hauing taken the said Earle, they ledde him out into the hall, after whome the Quēne followed, crying, Bel filz, bel filz, ayes pitie de gentil Mortimer, Good sonne, good sonne, take pitie vpon gentle Mortimer: for the suspected that that her ſonne was there, though ſhe ſaw him not. Then are the keyes of the Caſtle ſent for, and euery place with all the furniture is yelded vp into the kings hands, but in ſuch ſecret wiſe, that none without the caſtle, except the kings friends, vnderſtood thereof. The next day in the morning very early, they bring Roger Mortimer, & other his friends taken with him, with an horrible ſhout & crying (the earle of Lancaſter then blind, being one of them that made the ſhout for ioy) towards London, where he was committed to the Tower, and afterward condemned at Weſtminſter, in preſence of the whole parliament on S. Andrewes æuen next following, and then drawne to the Elmes, and there hanged on the common gallowes, whereon he hung two dayes and two nights by the Kings commaundement, and then was buried in the Gray Friers Church. He was condemned by his Peeres, and yet neuer was brought to anſwer before them, for it was not then the cuſtome, after the death of the Earles of Lancaſter, Winchester, Gloceſter, and Kent: wherefore this Earle had that law himſelfe, which he appointed for other.

The cauſes of his death laid againſt him, were theſe:

Firſt, that he was conſenting to the murdering of the Kings father.

Secondly, for that he had receiued a great ſumme of money, whereby the Kings honour was greatly abated at Stanhope Parke, where he gaue a ſigne vnto the Scots that they ſhould flie.

Thirdly, for that he cauſed certaine auncient deeds and Charters to be brent, wherein the king of Scots ſtood bound vnto the king of England: and eſpecially for that he had cauſed a contract to be made betwixt the Kings ſiſter, and Dauid the ſonne of Robert le Bruſe.

Fourthly, that hee had vnprofitably conſumed a great deale of treaſure which he found in the kings treaſurie, and in the treaſurie of the Earles of Winchester and Gloceſter.

Fiftly, for appropriating vnto himſelfe the wardes and marriages of all England.

Sixtly, for being an euill Counſellor to the king, and to the Queene mother, and for being ouermuch familiar with her. There dyed with him his friends Simon de Burford Knight, brother to ſir William Burford that was Iuſtice, and Iohn Deuerell Eſquier, who was deſirous to haue made open confeſſion of the kings fathers cruell death, but he could not be ſuffered ſo to doe. Iohn Mautreuers was attaint for the death of Edmond Earle of Kent. Thomas Gurney, William Ogle, for murthering king Edward the ſecond. Ann. reg. 5. 1331.

King Edward held a solemne Christmas at Wels in Somersetshire, which he continued till the feast of the Epiphanie, where were many strange and sumptuous shewes made, to pleasure the King and his guests.

In the beginning of August, Edward Bailiol, sonne and heire to Iohn King of Scots, came into England, which Edward had béen before that time banished out of Scotland. At his comming, he declared what right he had in the kingdome. Henry Beamount Earle of Bohune, Gilbert Vmfreuill Earle of Angus, Dauid Earle of Athels, Richard Talbot, Ralph Baron of Stafforde, Fulk Fitz Williams, with many other noble men, affirming they had right of inheritance in Scotland, desired licence and ayde of the King of England, to recouer the said kingdome and lands due to them, but the King hauing regard of the peace lately made, and also for his sisters sake Quéene of Scots, would not suffer them to leade an armie through his land, wherefore the said Lords getting a Fléet of ships, entred the sea, and sayling toward Scotland, landed at Kinkhorne, where the Earle of Fife, and Robert Bruse, bastard son to Robert Bruse, with ten M. Scots resisted them néere vnto Dunfermeling: but the Englishmen put them to flight, and slew many. Afterward, to wit, on S. Laurence day, they had a sore conflict at Gledesmore, where two thousand Englishmen ouercame fourtie thousand Scots. By reason of the great throng of the multitude amongst themselues, fiue Earles, & many other were throng-ed to death. On the morow, the Englishmen toke the Towne of S. Iohns, well furnished with victuals.

Edw. Bailiol resigned the Crowne of Scotland to King Edward of England.

The seuen and twentieth of September, Edward Bailiol was crowned King of Scots, but afterward he resigned it to King Edward of England, and remayned vnder his protection many yéeres after.

The King of England gathered a great power, and besieged Berwike, which at length was yelded for want of victualles. During this siege, the Scots sought many wayes to remoue the same, leuying a great armie ouer al Scotland; but comming to the siege, they could not bring their purpose to effect, yet still prouoking the Kings armie to battell: whereupon at length the two armies appointed to fight, and setting out vpon Halidowne hill, there commeth forth of the Scots campe a certaine stoute Champion of great stature, who for a fact by him done, was called Turnebull: he standing in the midst betwixt the two armies challenged al the Englishmen, any one of them to fight with him a Combat: at length, one Robert Venale Knight, a Norfolke man, requesting licence of the King, being armed, with his sword drawne, marcheth toward the Champiõ, meeting by ỹ way a certaine blacke mastiffe Dogge, which waited on the Champion, whom with his sword he sodainly strake, and cut him off at his loynes, at the sight whereof the maister of the Dogge slaine, was much abashed, and in his battell more warie and fearefull: whose left hand and head also afterward, this worthy Knight cut off. After this Combate both the armies met, but they fighting scarce half an houre, certaine of the Scots being slaine, they closed their armie (which was in three) all into one battell, but at length flying, the King followed them, taking and chasing them into lakes and pittes, for the space of fiue miles. There were slaine of them eight Earles, 1300. Horsemen, and of common souldiers 35000. at a place by Berwike, called Bothull, nere vnto Halidon. Ann. reg. 6. 1332.

In the meane season the Scots had besieged the castle of Bamburgh, in which at that time the Quéne was: but when they heard of the victorie aforesaid, they left the siege and fled. The townesmen of Berwike yelded to the King of England both the castle and the Towne, who placing garrisons there, he sent Edward Baliol, and other Nobles to kéepe the Realme of Scotland. Earle Patricius, in the nert Parliament holden at Yorke made fealtie, and did homage vnto the King by oath, who receiued of the King for yelding vp of Berwike vnto him, many honors and preferments: not withstanding this Earle returned againe to rebellion, who holding Dunbar against the King, was besieged by William Mountacute Earle of Salisburie.

Parliament at Yorke. The King summoned a Parliament to be holden at Yorke, the same to begin on Monday the second weeke of Lent: to the which Parliament, the king of Scots (called Conquerour) although he were warned to be there, yet hée came not, but sent messengers to excuse him, to wit, Henry de Bellemount and William Mountacute Earles, and certaine other Barons and Knights, who signified, that the King of Scots Conquerour could not be there without great daunger, for that certaine Scottes lay in the Ilands readie to doe him domage.

Parliament at London. In a Parliament at London it was told the king, that the Scots had taken Richard Talbot, and fiue other knights, and had slaine many footmen: wherefore the King toke a fiftéenth of the Cattle, and a tenth of the Cleargie, to the intent the malice of the Scots might be bridled.

Vniuersitie at Stamford forbidden. This yéere in the moneth of November diuers masters and schollers of Oxford withdrew themselues to Stamford, minding there to haue begunne an Vniuersitie, without licence of the King obtained in that behalfe: whereat the King being offended, did by proclamation vtterly forbid it, & suppressed it.

King Edward entred Scotland. King Edward went toward the Marches of Scotland, and wintered in those coasts, but vnderstanding that the Earle Dassels was traiterously turned to the Scots, and Henry Bellemount besieged by the Scottes, hée entred Scotland, and raised the siege, and then kept his Christmas at Rorbrow, which castle he repaired. Presently after the feast of the Epiphanie, the Frech King sent messengers to K. Edward, to wit, the Bishop of Aurenges, and Ann. reg. 8. 1334. certaine Lords, to treat a peace for the Scots, who waited for an answere in England till mid-lent, and then at Nottingham a truce was graunted vnto them till the feast of S. Iohn next comming, that in the meane time a Parliament might be holden of matters concerning peace, and the state of both the kingdomes: in which Parliament holden at Yorke, it was decréed that the K. should passe with his armie through Scotland, beyond the Scottish seas, the which thing was quickely performed & done: but the Scots desirous to fight a field, they feigned that they would haue peace, to obtaine the which, many came about the feast of S. whereupon it came to passe, that afterward the Earle of Mozefe being taken prisoner at Edenborough, was sent to be kept prisoner in England, and Richard Talbot was ransomed for two thousand fiue hundred markes, but the Earle of Dassels willing to shewe that he was truly reuolted to the king of England, rode against the Scottes at a siege of a certaine castle, and falling into the hands of his enemies, because hée would not yéeld, he was slaine with thirtéene of his men. James Card. of S^t Prisca Popr by name of Benedict XII.

After the feast of Saint Michael, the king continuing still in the marches of Scotland, was daily entreated by messengers from the French king, concerning some peace to be made.

About the feast of S. Martine, Edward Bohune a noble man, was drowned in the Marches of Scotland: for as hée was driuing a bottie of Cattell ouer a riuer, he felt himselfe in daunger, causing his guide to ride before him through the water, where through the smoothnesse of the stone whereon the water ran, his guide not being able to take sure footing fell downe, with his master being armed, and before any helpe could come, they were drowned in the bottome of the channell. Edw. Bohune drowned.

Iohn Archbishop of Canterburie went ouer the Sea to Philip de Valoys king of Fraunce, requesting of him the continuance of peace and amitie betwixt the two kingdomes to be maintained. Secondly, that all townes and castles taken before time by his father, should be restored to the king of England. Thirdly, that the said French king should sweare, neuer to giue aid to the Scottes against the king of England: vnder which conditions, the two kings of both Realmes should prepare to trauaile towards the Holy Land, and to fight against the enemies of Christ. But the French king accounted the king of England not worthie of his friendship, so long as he continued warres against the Scots his friends, whome he said were iust men. Vnto the second petition he would not otherwise consent thereunto, than if all charges were repaid againe which his father Charles de Valoys laid out in the warres of Gascoigne. Thirdly, he said, that he was a friend and louer of iustice and equitie, which he would neuer swarue from, neither for friendship, nor affinitie, but he would by all meanes he could, molest and vexe all breakers of the peace of the kingdome of Scotland: for (saith he) there shall neuer be perfect peace and quietnesse among Christians, before the king of Fraunce sit in place of iudgement for the right of the kingdomes of France, England, and Scotland.

Upon Saint Clements night, through abundance of waters, but specially in the Thamis, all the cattell and beasts néere thereunto were drowned, and the land made vnfruitfull by salt waters. Great waters.

These be the poynts agréed betwixt the Councell of the Kings of England and Scotland on the one party, and Alexander Mowbrey, Geffrey Mowbrey, Godfrey de Roos, William Bullocke, and Eustace de Loreyne, hauing full power from Dauid Stravulgi, Earle of Dassels, and Robert Steward of Scotland, to treate, accord, and affirme all poynts enterparled and to be enterparled betwixt the said kings, and the Earle, and Steward, as appeareth by their letters patents of either partie.

First it is accorded that the said Earle Dassels, the great men, and all other of the communaltie of Scotland, which shall come in the same conditions, shall haue life and member, lands and tenements, fées and offices within Scotland, which they ought to haue by inheritance or right, those except, which shall be surprised by common assent.

Item, that they shall be pardoned of imprisonment, and of all manner trespasses by them done in the Realms of England and Scotland from the beginning of the world, vnto the date of these presents.

Item, the Earle Dassels, and Alexander Mowbrey, shall haue lands, tenements, possessions, and fées in England, which they had at their departure, after the homage done at Newcastle vpon Tine.

Item, that the franchises of the Church in Scotland shall be maintayned, after the auncient vsage of Scotland.

Item, that the lawes of Scotland in Borough Townes, & Shriuewikes, within the lands of the king of Scotland, be vsed after the auncient vsages and custome of Scotland, as they were vsed in the dayes of king Alexander.

Item, that the offices of Scotland be ministred by people of the same Nation, yet notwithstanding, that alwaies the king of Scotland may put such officers in as shall please him, of what nation soeuer they be.

Item, that all those that within the conditions of the Earle Dassels haue lands within the lands of the king of England in Scotland, shall haue againe the same lands, tenements, possessions, offices and fées, as they had them at their departure, after their homage done at Newcastle vpon Tine, except those that shall be reserued by common assent.

Item, that if they be empleded for their landes and tenements aforesaid, that they haue their defences and recoueries in Court where they ought to haue.

Item, as touching the demaund which the Earle Dassels claimeth, that the king of England ought to acquite his lands in England which he hath in gage for eight hundred markes, the king neither ought, nor will do it, but as touching the Manor of Wyphingdone, which the said Earle laide to pledge for two hundred and fiftie pounds, it is accorded that if the said Earle do come within one

one yeare, after the date of these presents, and will acquite the Manor, the king shall cause that he haue the same Manour.

Item, as touching the Castle and Landes of Chillam, it is accorded that the said Earle be in the same poynt that he was before at his departure, and haue his recouerie by lawe, and the king promiseth in good faith that he will cause that he may haue the land, without delaying either partie. And touching the lands which the sayd Earle claymeth to haue in Norfolke, of the which he hath charters, it is accorded that his charters being séen of the kings Counsell, he will doe reason.

Item, that in case any man surmise treason vpon the saide Earle, he may defend himselfe by his bodie, according to the lawes and vsages of Scotland, and on the marches, and that all those that be within these conditions, haue the like graunt.

Item, as to the pardon which William Ramsey knight demaundeth for the trespasse by him done to William Lord Mountague, to wéete, for beating down his castle of Haghtordone, the same William shall be ready to doe according to that that shall be aduised by the Kings of England and Scotland.

Item, that the said Stacie de Loraine haue his lands and tenements which he ought to haue within the Realme of Scotland, and if any man haue trespassed towards him, he shall haue his recouery by law. Written at Saint Johns Towne in Scotland the 18. of August, Anno 1335.

About the feast of the Epiphanie, the King and the Archbishop returned out of Scotland, to the buriall of Iohn of Eltham, Earle of Cornewall, brother vnto the King, who deceased at Berwike in the moneth of October, and was buried at Westminster. At which time, the King kept a Parliament at London, which began on the Munday after Saint Matthies day: and on the first Sunday in Lent, he made his eldest sonne Edward Earle of Chester, and Duke of Cornewall. He made also fiue other Earles, Henrie of Lancaster (sonne to Henrie Earle of Lancaster) Earle of Derbie, Hugh Audley Earle of Glocester, William Bohune Earle of North-hampton, William Mountacute Earle of Salisburie, William Clinton Earle of Huntingdon, Robert Vfford Earle of Suffolke, to the which Robert he at that time gaue the Manor of Base-court, in the Parish of Saint Giles without Créeplegate of London, commonly called to this day the Barbicane, because in olde time the same had bin a Burgekening, or watch-tower for the citie. An. reg. 10. The 20. of March, the K. graunted by his Letters patents power to the Chauncellor of the Vniuersitie of Cambridge, to receiue in his name yérely the oathes of the Maior, Bayliffes, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the towne: which euer since hath so continued.

After the feast of Saint Michael, a Parliament was holden at London, and a Conuocation was assembled by the Archbishop, wherein the Clergie granted a tenth for three yéeres, and the Commons a fifteenth, in consideration of the Kings warres which was hot in Scotland, and also to resist the French King, who made great braggs, and shewed great crueltie, for he outlawed, slew, and imprisoned all Englishmen, and confiscated the goods and cattels of all that were found in his kingdome of Fraunce, threatning that he would be reuenged for his friends the Scots.

Ann. reg. 11.

Moreouer, he let not so much as one towne or castle in the Counties of Aquitaine, or of Poyters, that was not seized into his hands: whereupon king Edward sent into Brabant, to take vp all the woolles which Merchants had brought thither, and made sale thereof for ready mony. He also wrote letters to the French king, exhorting him, that he would continue his old amitie. Sir Walter Many being the Ambassador for the king of England, and desirous to reuenge the blood of two Englishmen that were slaine comming a land for fresh water, in a certaine Iland, called the Ile of Agnes, nigh vnto Flaun-

1337. ders, he caused all that he found in the said Iland to be put to the sword, and tooke prisoner the Earle of Flanders brother, who was captaine of the Ile.

Tho. Walsing. Men to the number of 3000. brent in a Church.

Certaine of the Iland men being fled into a Church, were brent to the number of three thousand, with the Church and all, by the Welshmen.

The warres being thus as aforesaid begun betwixt the two kingdomes, the rumour thereof came vnto the court of Rome, whereupon the Pope sent two Cardinals for the reformation and ordering of the peace betwixt the two kingdomes: who comming to Westminster, declared before the King the cause of their comming: whereunto the K. answered, that although without all reason they did séeme to restraine him of right and equitie, for that he ought to succeed into the kingdome of his forefathers, the which his aduersarie Philip de Valoys did deny him, expelling, murthering, and imprisoning his people, and taking away the Dukedome of Aquitaine, and Earledome of Poyters without cause, maintaining the Scots and other rebels against him, yet these iniuries notwithstanding, he was contented if they could take order for the quiet enioying of Aquitaine, and other fées belonging vnto him, which his predecessors did enioy.

Moreouer, for the dismissing of all aid that the French king should giue vnto the Scots at any time of rebellion, for the which he offered his money, and also the marriage of his eldest sonne, and also to resigne all such rites and interest that he had to the kingdome of Fraunce.

The Cardinals being greatly comforted with this answere, departed, hoping that all warres were now ended. They toke with them Iohn the Archbishop of Canterburie, Richard Bishop of Durham, & Geffrey Lord Scrope, who all together went on message with the kings answere to the French king, hauing full authoritie to treat and conclude a peace.

These being so reasonable offers, could not pacifie the furious mind of the French king, who reposed great trust in the Scots, hoping by them, and through their meanes, quite to dispossesse, and to disinherite the king of England of all the title he had.

This yéere on the 7. of October, King Edward began the foundation of his Colledge in Cambridge, that since was called the Kings hall, but now with Michael house, and Physicke hostell, all made into one by King Henry the 8. is called Trinitie Colledge. Kings hall in Cambridge.

Also this yéere because of the warres with Fraunce, king Edward caused to be confiscated all the goods of the Priories aliens in England, that is to say, such Priories as were selles to any monasteries in Fraunce. He let out the Priories to farme, with all their lands and tenements, and rented them at his pleasure for the space of three and twentie yéeres: in the which time diuers of those Priories were purchased of the king, made frée, and againe (as it were) new founded by Englishmen, as Mitburie in the Castle, and other: the residue not changed, were in the fiue and thirtieth yéere of king Edwards raigne againe restored to their lands: as shall be shewed when I come to it. Priors aliens in England their goods confiscate. An. reg. 12.

The king toke Woll, to a certaine number of sackes, at a low price in euery countrey: the number that was set vpon Staffordshire was fiue hundred sacks, price nine markes the sacke of good woll: but nothing was paid. First, the Woll was vniuersally taken. Secondly, for the halfe, in whose hands soeuer it were found, as well Merchants as other. And the third time the king toke a fiftéenth of the comminaltie, to be paid in woll, price of euery stone (containing fourtéene pound) two shillings. 1338.

The king appointed also all the Corne and glebe lands to serue for his warres.

About S. Margarets day, king Edward, with Quéene Philip his wife, and a great armie passed the Seas with a Nauie of fiue hundred saile of ships into Flaunders, and so to Cullen. Rob. Auesbury.

The fourth of October, fiftie Gallies well manned and furnished, came to South-hampton about nine of the clocke, and sacked the towne, the townsmen running away for feare: by the breake of the next day they which fled, by helpe of the countrey thereabout, came against the Pyrats, and fought with them: South-hampton sacked and brent by the French Pyrates.

them, in the which skirmish were slaine to the number of three hundred Pyrates, togither with their Captaine a young Souldiour the King of Sicils sonne. To this young man, the French king had giuen whatsoeuer he got in the kingdome of England: but he being beaten downe by a certaine man of the countrey, cryed Rancon, notwithstanding the husband-man layd him on with his clubbe, till he had slaine him, speaking these words: yea (quoth he) I know well enough thou art a Francon, and therefore shalt thou dye, for he vnderstood not his speech, neither had he any skill to take Gentlemen prisoners, and to keepe them for their raunsome: wherefore the residue of those Genowayes, after they had set the Towne a fire and burnt it vp quite, fledde to their Galleyes, and in their flying, certaine of them were drowned. And after this, the inhabitants of the town compassed it about with a strong and great wall.

The king still maintaining his warres in Fraunce, on the euen of the Annunciation of our Lady, eleuen gallies approching to the towne of Harwich, they cast fire therein: the force wherof, by a contrary wind was staied, so that no great harme was done thereby. Furthermore, in the same yeere about the feast of Pentecost, certaine Pyrats of Normandie and Genoa (shipped in Gallyes and Pinnates) made a shew on the Sea about South-hampton, as they would haue come aland, and threatned sore to spoile the towne againe, but perceiuing the townsmen ready to resist them, they returned to the Ile of Wight, but entred not, being put backe by the inhabitants: whereupon they sailed about the sea coasts, seeking to land in places lesse defended, and after came to Hastings, where they burnt Fishers cottages, with their boats, and slew many men. Also they made great shewes many times against the Ile of Thanet, Doner, and Fulkestone, but in those places they did little harme, except to poore Fishermen: thence they sailed about to the hauens of Cornwall and Deuonshire, doing in all places much harme to the Fishermen, and such ships as they found vnmanned, they fiered. At length they entred Plimmouth Hauen, where they burnt certaine great ships, and a great part of the Towne: these were met by Hugh Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, a knight of fourescore yeeres old, being accompanied with many souldiours of his countrey, who hauing lost at the first front a fewe of his men which were slaine by the quarels of the French, ioyned to fight with them hand to hand, and slaying many of the pyrates vpon drie land, chased the residue which fledde to take their gallyes, and being not able to come nigh them by wading, they were drowned in the sea to the number of fiue hundred. Newes being brought to the King lying in Brabant, that diuers Portes of England were spoyled with the Pirates, hee declared to his friendes, to wit, the Marques of Iuliacense, and a certaine Cardinall, what great causes hee had to reuenge himselfe vpon them, and in the end, was answered by the Cardinall as followeth.

The French men spoyle the towne of Plimouth.

The kingdome of Fraunce (saide he) is compassed about with a threede of silke, which cannot bee broken, by all the strength of the kingdome of England, wherefore my Lord king, you must stay for the comming of the Dutchmen, men, and other your friends and confederates, the greater part whereof you now lacke. The King taking great disdaine hereat, saying nothing at all, said, that he would ride into the land of Fraunce with banner displaied, and that there he would looke for that mightie power of the French men, and that he would either win the same against any man that should withstand him, or else honestly die in the field.

King Edward wintered at Antwerpe, where Quéene Philip was deliuered of her third sonne Lionel after Earle of Ulster. The king toke vpon him to be Lieutenant of the Empire from the Duke of Bauare, who helde himselfe as Emperour. K. Edward made Vicegerent of the Empire.

The first day of the assumption of our Lady, a suddaine inundation of water at Newcastle vpon Tine, surmounted the wall, and bare downe a peéce of the Towne wall, a fire pearches in length néere to a place called Walknew, where 160. men, and seuen Chapleins and women were drowned. Li. f. Mari. ebo. Rich. South. Newcastle drowned.

In the Vigil of S. Matthy king Edward began to ride with banner displaied, and twelue thousand men of armes, against the French king, burning townes and castles where soeuer he came. In the first night being very darke, Geffrey Lord Scrope one of the kings Iustices, led one of the Cardinals, to wit, Bertrand de Mount Fauentine, of the title of our Lady, vp into an high Tower, shewing him the whole land about toward Fraunce, for the compasse of fiftéene leagues, to be in euery place on fire, (saying these words,) Sir, doth not this silken threéd wherewith Fraunce is compassed, séeme to you to be broken? the Cardinal answering nothing, fell down as dead for sorow and feare. An. reg. 13. King Edward inuadeth Fraunce. 1339.

In this sort King Edward made iourneyes into Fraunce daily, continuing the space of fiue wéekes, and caused his armie to trauell in such sort, that they destroyed the whole Countrey of Cambray, Tourney, Aermoden, and Landenew, excepting those Cities which were sworne to him, with Churches and Castles. The inhabitants of the Countrey fled, neither was there any man that durst resist his enterprises, although the French king had gathered great armies within the walled Cities, himselfe lying in the strong Towne of Saint Quintines, what time the Brabanders had determined to returne home againe, and were entred into their iourney, being forced thereunto, partly by want of victuals, and partly by the coldenesse of Winter which grew on fast.

The French king vnderstanding thereof, began to moue himselfe with his armie toward the campe of the King of England, who gladly looking for his comming, called backe againe the Brabanders, and hauing receiued Letters from the French king, that he would ioyne battell against him, he sent him word backe againe, that he would stay for him three dayes, wherefore on the fourth day the king looking for the French kings comming, which would come no néerer them then two miles off, breaking bridges, and felling of trées, that the King of England might not follow him, hée fled to Paris, whereupon King Edward returned by Hanonia into Brabant, where he continued almost the whole winter.

teine in Fraunce, gaue vnto William de la Poole for the succour of money frankely by him lent, and freely brought vnto him in the coasts of Brabant, so as thereby his honour was preserued, which otherwise was in daunger greatly to haue been embased, to be honoured with the Militarie girdle, appointing him to keepe, and continue the state and honour of a Baneret: and he gaue him the manors of Burstwike, and Skyp, with the appurtenances of two hundred and fortie markes, in part of fiue hundred marks land yeerely, more conueniently to maintaine the same estate. And 200. markes, yeerly to be receiued of the customes in the port of the towne of Kingstone, vntill he were prouided of two hundred and threescore markes land of yeerely reuenue. Finally, because William had deliuered him, laying his owne goods and lands in gage, for recouering the kings right in Fraunce, the king graunted, that if he recouered the rights of inheritance in Fraunce, he would further within the realme of Fraunce (in some competent place) giue to him and to his heires, a thousand markes sterling by yeere.

This W. was father to Michaell Lord Wingfild earle of Suffolk and knight of the Garter, who had issue Michael Earle of Suffolke, who died at Harflew 1415. left issue two sons, Michaell earle of Suffolk that died at Agincourt the 3. of H. 5. without issue, and Will. Lord Marques and afterward duke of Suff. beheaded the 26. of H. the 6.

In this winter time, King Edward grewe into great friendship with the Flemings, who prepared at all times to shewe their selues as good subiects vnto him, swearing to doe homage and fealtie, vpon condition that he would call himselfe king of Fraunce: and in token thereof, would from thenceforth giue armes with Flouredeluces, for otherwise they durst not obey him, for feare of the Popes curse, which was to be laid vpon them, if at any time they rebelled against the King of Fraunce. Wherefore by the counsell of the Flemings, and consent of his noblemen, he agreed thereunto, and toke vpon him both the name and armes of the king of Fraunce. He also toke Flaunders vnder his gouernment, the people whereof long after in all matters were to him obedient, as vnto the king of Fraunce Conquerour. Touching the title and armes aforesaid, the French King said to certaine Englishmen sent vnto him: Our cousin (quoth he) doth wrongfully beare quartered armes of England and Fraunce, which matter notwithstanding doth not much displease vs, for that he is descended from the weaker side of our kinne, and therfore as being a bachelor, we would be content to graunt him licence to beare part of our armes of Fraunce: but whereas in his seales and letters patents he nameth himselfe as well king of England as of Fraunce, and doth set the first quarter of his armes with leopards, before the quarter of Lilies, it doth grieue vs very much, making apparant to the beholders, that the little Iland of England, is to be preferred before the great kingdome of Fraunce. To whom sir Iohn of Shordich knight, made answere, That it was the custome of men in those dayes, to set the title and armes of their progenitors, before the armes and title of the right descending of their mother: and thus of dutie and reason (said he) doth my Lord the king of England preferre his armes.

Sir Iohn of Shordich his answer to the French king.

King Edward being thus busied, he kept his Christmasse at Gaunt: the Mariners of the Cinque Portes, embarked themselues in pinaces and small boats well appointed, who after the feast of S. Hillarie arriued at Bononie vpon the Sea coast, the weather being so cloudie and darke, that they could scarsely be perceiued to be in the hauen: they went in the lower towne ninetéene galleys and foure great shippes, and twentie small boates with all their tackling, and all such houses as were situate nigh to the sea coast, amongst which was one great house full of oares, sayles, weapons, and other necessaries, sufficient to furnish ninetéene galleyes, and men for them: at the length in a skirmish betwirt the townesmen and the Englishmen, many of the land men were slaine.

About the beginning of Februarie King Edward returned into England, came vnto Gaunt, where the Quéene lay in childebed of her fourth sonne named Iohn, he held a Parliament at Westminster, wherein the Temporaltie graunted him euery ninth fléece of Woll, euery ninth Lambe, and euery ninth sheafe of all sortes of corne, and the Cleargie gaue him a new tenth. John of Gaunt. Parliament at Westminster. 1340.

Immediatly after Easter, the Earles of Salisburie and Suffolke, being accompanied but with a few men, gaue an assault vnto the Towne of Lile in Flaunders, which Towne was confederate with the French king, but they chasing the Frenchmen to farre within the gates, the Portcullices being let fall, they were beset with a multitude of men of armes, and being taken, they were conueyed into France, fettered and shackeled with yron, although they had sworne to be true prisoners: they were drawne in a cart through the middest of euery citie, towne, village and hamlet, with great shoutes and cries, rayling on them: and at length being brought to the presence of the French king, he would haue most shamefully slaine them, had he not béen otherwise perswaded by the counsell of the king of Boemia.

The seuenth day of May the king gaue to William Marquelle Iulliers, and to the heires of his bodie, the Earledome of Cambridge, with the towne and castle, and twentie poundes by yeare in fée, and created him at Westminster by the girding of a sworde, whereof he also made him his charter with the gift of one thousand pounds of yearely rent. Record.

King Edward kept his Whitsontide at Ipswich, for that he intended from thence to take his passage into Flaunders, but being certified that the French king had sent a great nauie of Spanish shippes, and also the whole fléete of France, to stoppe his passage, he caused his shippes of the Cinque Ports and other to be assembled, so that he had in his fléete great and small two hundred and threescore ships.

Wherefore on the Thursday before the nativitie of Saint Iohn Baptist, hauing a prosperous wind, he began to sayle, and the next day in the éeuen of the sayd feast, they espied the French fléete lying in Swine hauen. Wherefore the king caused all his fléete to come to anker.

The next day being the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist, early in the morning, the French fléete diuided themselues into three parts, and remoued themselues as it were a mile, approching towards the kings fléete. Great fight on the sea, against the French.

Which when the king perceiued, about nine of the clocke, hauing the wind and sunne on his backe, set forward and met his enemies as he would haue wished, wherewithall the whole fléete gaue a terrible shoute, and a showre of arrowes out of long wooden bowes so powred downe on the French men, that thousands were slaine in that meeting, at length they closed and came to hand blowes, with pikes, polaxes, and swordes, and somethewe stones from the toppes of shippes wherewith many were brained.

The greatnesse and height of the Spanish shippes caused many Englishmen to strike many a stroke in vaine. But to be shorte, the French shippes being ouercome, and all the men spent of the first part, the Englishmen entred and toke them.

The French shippes were chayned together in such sort, that they could not be separated one from another, so that a fewe Englishmen kept that part of the fleete: wherefore they set vpon the second warde, and with great difficultie gaue the charge, which being done, was sooner ouercome then the first, for that the French men leauing their shippes, many of them leapt ouer boorde.

Flor. Rudolphus Curate of Sucken writ his Trauels to ye Holy Land & a History of Æthiopia.

The Englishmen hauing thus ouercome the first and second part of the fleete, and nowe hauing night drawing on, partly for want of light, and partly for that they were wearie, they determined to take some rest till the nexte morning, wherefore that night thirtie shippes of the third trewe fledde away, and a great shippe called the James of Dieppe, thinking to haue carried away a certaine ship of Sandwich belonging to the Maior of Canturbury was staied: for the Sailers so stoutly defended themselues by the helpe of the Earle of Huntingdon that they saued themselues, and their ship from the Frenchmen. The fight continued all the night, and in the morning the Normans being ouercome and taken, there were found in the ship aboue foure hundreth men slaine. Moreouer, the King vnderstanding that thirtie ships were fled, he sent fourtie ships well appointed to followe them, ouer the which he made Iohn Crabbe gouernor: but what good speede he had is not knowen.

In the first company of shippes that were taken they found these conquered shippes, the Denis, the George, the Christopher, and the blacke Cocke, all which shippes were taken by Frenchmen at Sluce, and carried into Normandie.

The number of ships of warre that were taken, was about two hundred and thirtie barges: the number of enemies that were slaine and drowned were aboue fiue and twentie thousand, and of Englishmen about foure thousand, among whom were foure Knights, Sir Thomas Mortimer the Kings cousin, Sir Thomas Latimer his sonne, Sir William Butler of Scotborne, and Sir Thomas Poynings.

About the same time the Scots came with a great power into England, burning and spoyling all the Marches by fire and sword, and when they were returning with a great bootie of cattell, the common people set vpon them, toke their bootie, slewe many of them, and toke more then fourescore Scots of good reputation, whom they kept for ransome, for the which fact the Noblemen of the Marches were highly displeased.

The French assault the Ile of Wight.

About Lammas certaine French pirats gaue an assault to the Ile of Wight and sodainely entred it, but Sir Peter Russell Knight, meeting them with the people of that Ile, put them backe againe, and made them to flie, slaying many of them, in the which skirmish the said Knight was wounded whereof he died. These pirats sayled thence toward the coast of Deuonshire, and comming to Teignmouth, they set fire on the towne and brent it: from thence they sailed towards Plimouth, which towne was so defended, that they could not hurt it, but brent the farmes and faire places nigh adioyning, and toke a Knight prisoner, whom they carried with them.

The same yeere King Edward besieged Tourney, but vpon intreatie made by the French, a truce was taken from Michaelmas till Midsummer, wherefore the king comming to Gaunt in Flaunders, stayed there, looking for money out of England, which came not. King Edward besieged Tourney.

King Edward with eight of his men, saying that he would ride abroade for his pleasure, secretly came into Zeland, where taking shippe, after he had sayled three dayes and three nights, on S. Andrewes day at night about the Cocke crowing, he entred the Tower of London by water, being waited on by the Earle of Northampton, Nicholas Cantilopo, Reignalde Cobham, Giles de Bello Campo, Iohn de Bello Campo Knights, William Killesby, and Phillip Weston priests: earely in the morning he sent for his Chancellour, Treasurour, and Iustices then being at London, and the Bishop of Chichester being his Chancellour, and the Bishop of Couentry his treasurour, he put out of office, minding also to haue sent them into Flaunders, to haue been pledges for money he owed there: but the Bishop of Chichester declared vnto him what danger might insue to him, by the Canons of the Church: whereupon the king dismissed them out of the Tower: but as concerning the high Iustices, to wit, Iohn Lord Stoner, Robert Lord Willowby, William Lord Scharshell, and especially Nicholas de la Bech, who before that time was Lieutenant of the Tower of London, and Sir Iohn Molens Knight, with certaine marchant men, as Iohn Poultney, William Poole, and Richard his brother, and the Chancellours chiefe Clearkes, to wit, Maister Iohn de Saint Paul, Michell Wathe, Henry Stafford, and certaine of the Exchequer, as Maister Iohn Thorpe, with many other moe, the King commaunded to be imprisoned, some in one place, some in an other, neither would he suffer them to be discharged thence, till he were throughly pacified of his anger conceiued for not sending the mony which should haue serued at the siege of Tourney. King Edward returned secretly into England, and entred the Tower by night. Pehurch flor. Will. Poole and Richard his brother.

This yeere about Christmas, Henry Bishop of Lincolne, and Geffrey Lord Scrope, chiefe Iusticiar to the King and his chiefe Counseller died at Gaunt.

King Edward kept his Christmas at Gildford, and after that a great Iusting at Reding. An. reg. 15.

Also at Candlemas he kept a great iusting at Langley, for the honour of the Noblemen of Wasconia, which he trained vp there in feates of warre. He made Robert de Boursier Knight Lord Chancellour of England, and Robert Parnike Knight treasurer, the one to succeede the other. Also he sent out Iusticiars that should sit in euery shire, to enquire concerning the collectours of the tenths and fiftenths, and of wolles, and to ouersee all officers. And because the Citie of London would not suffer that any such officers should sit as Iustices within their Citie as inquisitours of such matters contrary to their Iusting at Reding and at Langley. Iustice of Trailbaston, forbidden to sit in London.

liberties, the King prouided that those Iustices should hold their Sessions in the Tower of London, to make inquisition of the domages of the Londoners: but because the Londoners would not answere there, vntill their liberties 1341. were fully confirmed, neither any such confirmation could be had either of the King, or his Chauncellour touching Writtes and Charters in the Tower, there rose thereof such a great tumult, that the Iustices appointed there to sit, fained that they would holde no Session, till after Easter. Whereupon the King being highly offended for the said tumult, and desirous to knowe the names of them that had raysedit, could not vnderstand but that they were certaine meane persons, who claimed their liberties: whereupon the King being pacified of his troubled minde, forgaue all the offences committed by the Londoners, the Iustices breaking vp all their sitting touching the said place.

Parliament at London.

This yeere within the quindene of Easter a parliament was holden at London, wherein the Earles and Nobles of the realme, with the commons requested, that the Charter called Magna Carta, and Carta Foresta, with all other liberties belonging to the Church and kingdome should be obserued, and that the officers and chiefe rulers of the Kings house should be chosen by the peeres of the realme, in the parliament: but these petitions the King would not confirme, nor could abide to heare talked of.

About the beginning of the moneth of July, King Edward receiued letters from Lodowike Duke of Bauary, vsurper of the Romane Empire, in the which pretending friendship betwixt him and Philip the French King, he signified that those warres which the King of England had begun in France, did greatly mislike him, and therefore desired that there should be concord and amitie betwixt the Kings of both realmes, the which to be performed, he offered to bestow some labour, requesting King Edwards letters of authority thereof to treate and to conclude a truce for one yeere or twaine, toward the end of which letter he addeth these words: The deputation and lieutenant ship which we gaue vnto you, we doe for diuerse and sundry causes reuoke againe. Dated at Frankeford the fouretéenth of June in the seuen and twentieth of our raigne, and of our Empire the fouretéenth. To the which letters, King Edward wrote an inscription, in forte as followeth.

Benedict. xii. dies at Auignon his Epitaph

To the renoumed Prince Lodowike, by the grace of God Romane Emperour, alwayes Augustus, Edward by the same grace King of France and England, Lord of Ireland &c.

King Edward gaue the Earledom of Cambridge to Iohn Lord Hengault, vnele to Quéene Phillip, and after kept his feast of S. Katherine at Newcastell, and his Christmasse also. Vntill this time Dauid King of Scots threatned to leuie an armie, and to enter the land, whereupon King Edward entred Scotland, and followed after Dauid, who fled before him beyond the Scottish sea, wasting and spoyling all as he went, except Castles and Parishes, in the which the Scottes together with Dauid their King hidde themselues. And

K. Edward ruined Scotland.

William

William Mountacute Earle of Salisburie, hauing gotten a great fléete, entred an Iland belonging to Scotland, where most victoriously he conquered it, and the same Ile being called the Ile of Man, the King gaue it to the conquerour frankely and frélye to be possessed, and caused him to be called and crowned king of that Ile. Then king Edward returning towards the south parts, kept solemne turneaments at Dunstable, being accompanied with two hundred and thirtie knights.

Will. Mountacute Earle of Salisburie, conquered, and was crowned King of Man.

The same yeare was a Parliament at Westminster, wherein the Archbishop of Canterbury, was reconciled to the king, before whom the Archbishop sware that although the king by his counsell and consent had done homage to the French king for the Dukedome of Aquitaine, and the Earledome of Poytow, yet he neuer consented thereto as to be any hurt or prejudice to the king, or that by his counsell he might incurre fauour, or séeke to please the French King, but for that present time he thought it best to be done, both for the obtaining of peace, and also for the profite of the king and realme.

Parliament at Westminster.

After this Parliament the king commanded florences of golde to be made at the Tower of London, that is to say, the penny of the value of sixe shillings eight pence, the halfe penny of the value of three shillings foure pence, a farthing worth twenty pence.

Florences of golde.

In a Parliament at Westminster, in the moneth of May, the religious men that were possessours of lands, granted to the king, towards the maintenance of his warre, all their iewels and plate, aswell siluer as golde, horses, carts and wagons, whereupon the kings treasure was notably enriched. Ann. reg. 17. 1343.

The same yeare authoritie was giuen to the kings escheters, to enquire and certifie the Counsell of all such persons, which helde of the king any lands in capite, or by any other fée, to the value of one hundred shillings, and that the names of all such should be enrolled and giuen vp for record. Also certaine other were put in authoritie to signifie how many sufficient and able bowemen were in euery shire: also what other sufficient men were able to beare armour for the defence of their Countrey, and to see them practised with such kind of weapon wherein they had best skill: and being thus assembled in all parts of the realme, specially such as were of lawfull age, commaundement was giuen out, that they should be ready at the kings commaundement to fight against their enemies.

A generall suruey of the whole realme of England.

King Edward and his nobles perceiuing the derogation that was done to the Realme by such reseruations, prouisions and collations of benefices, as the Pope practised here in England, wrote to him, requiring, that sith the Churches of England had béen founded and endowed by noble and worthie men, to the ende the people might be instructed by men of their owne language, and that hée being so farre off, could not vnderstand the defaultes, yet his predecessours, and he more then had béen vsed, by diuers reseruations, prouisions, and collations made to diuers persons, some strangers, yea, and some enemies to the Realme, whereby the money and profites were carried forth, their cures not prouided for, according to the founders minds, they therefore vpon due considerations signified to him, that they

Many being called to ayde the King against the Scottes, but not being ready, they contributed their money, wherewith the King might hire souldiours in place of them that remayned at home. This yeare saith one written booke in French, K. Edward held a great feast at Windsor of 300. knights, and as many Ladies, with great outrage of expences and costs.

King Edward caused to be called together a great many of Artificers, to the Castell of Windsor, and began to build an house which was called the round Table, the floore whereof, from the Center or midde poynt into the compasse, was an hundred foote, and the whole Diameter two hundred foote, and the circumference thereof is fiue hundred foote and three quarters.

The same time Philip de Valoys King of Fraunce, builded a round Table in his Countrey, to the end that he might allure the men of Warre of Germanie and Italie, and so to keepe them from the King of Englands round Table.

King Edward in succour of Iohn Mountfort Duke of Brytaine, and of his wife and children, who then remained in the kings custody, sent the Earles of Northampton, and of Orford, Hugh Spencer, and Richard Talbot knights, and Master William Killesby Clearke, euery one of them hauing vnder them many men of armes and archers, into Brytaine, who entred thereinto, in despight of all their enemies which resisted them, making many conflicts. They tooke as well walled townes as other, with diuers fortresses and castles, both by assault and surrender, by which meanes they had the whole countrey vnder their subiection, conquering till they came to the towne of Nozleis, where Battaile at Nozleis.

Charles de Bloys met them with a great army. Therefore in the champaine ground nigh vnto Nozleys, the two armies made great and most stoute battell, wherein the worthinesse of both sorts did full well appeare: for they fought so stoutly, that in the first conflict it chaunced as the like had not béen séene: for the chiefe Captaines, Charles de Bloys, to whome the French King had giuen the Dukedome of that countrey, and William de Bohun Earle of Northampton, who for the defence of the right of Iohn de Mountfort, naturall heire and Duke of that land, the King of England had made a Generall ouer the armie of the Englishmen, fought so long with hand strokes in the fielde that day, that no man but a liar could giue more praise to the one then to the other. Three times that day they being wearied on both sides, withdrew themselues to take breath, and then fell to it againe with speare and shield, and sword and target: but in the end the right worthie and stout Charles de Bloys, his men séeing many, was also forced to sée himselfe, whereupon after many slaine on both sides, the victory fel to the Englishmen.

King Edward sent ouer Henry Earle of Derby, sonne to the Earle of Lancaster his cousin, with more then fiue hundred men of armes, amongst whom was the Earle of Penbroke, and Walter de Many, with many Archers into Gascoigne, with Ralph Baron of Stafford Seneschall of Gascoigne, who being come thither, the said Earle made fifty knights of his army, and after wan many walled townes and castles, making many worthy skirmishes, and at length wonne the Towne of Dagunlowne by assault, to the keeping whereof they appointed Ralph Stafford, after ward they appointed three tourneyes toward other Townes, as especially to Brigerecke (so called for the strength thereof, and also called the chamber of France) and also to the towne of Saint Iohn de Laruell, and to many other great and strong Townes well fortified, which with great toiles and diuers dangerous assaults they wan: where the Earle of Derby and his souldiours vndermining the towers and walles of the said towne, were very sore assaulted by them which defended it.

An. reg. 19.

Ro. Auesbury. 1345.

Thus he conquered cities, townes, castles and fortresses, to the number of one hundred and fiftie, bringing a great part of Gascoigne vnder subiection, euen to Tolouse, vnto the which citie he did no domage, neither to the inhabitants thereof, but that he made them wonderfully afraide: as certaine of them tolde me (saith my author) their feare was such, that the religious people were constrained to beare armour, and the Prior of the Carmelite Friers of our Lady of Tolouse, hauing a banner of our Lady in golde set in a fielde of siluer, displayed the same, prouoking thereby many to take armour.

About the second sunday in Lent, the earles being fully fraught with boty, prisoners, gold and siluer, they returned towards Burdeaux, where Iohn de Valoys, eldest sonne to the French king, being accompanied with a great number of hyred Dutch souldiours, besieged the towne of Agnlowne, and the captaines thereof the Earle of Stafford and other, so entrenched the same Towne, that without great daunger the Englishmen could haue no accesse vnto them, but the Earle of Derby beate away them that besieged the Citie, and victualled the same, notwithstanding they were not able to raise the siege, because they had so intrenched themselues without the towne, who refusing to fight in the field, would answere, that they came not to pitch a fielde, but to besiege a Towne, wherefore they continued the same siege vntill the decollation of Saint Iohn, but vnderstanding then that the king of England chased his father Philip very sore to Cressie, and fearing that he should come very late to the ayde of his father, he gaue vp the siege, setting all his tents on fire, and fled in the darke, but the Earle of Stafford with his power pursued them, cut off their taile, toke a great many of their horses, and returned.

After this certaine bow-men are mustered in England, appointed to be sent ouer sea, who comming ouer, are layde in garrison for defence of the countrey. Also twentie thousand sackes of woll are graunted to the King. Moreouer, Geffrey de Harecourt a Norman, came to the King requiring ayde against the French King, who wrongfully with-helde his landes from him:

Richard de Burie, Bishop of Durham deceased. Thomas of Hatfield succeeded.

Richard de Bury deceased at Aukland, when hee had sate Bishoppe of Durham eleuen yéeres, two moneths, and odde dayes, and was buried at Durham, vnto whome succéeded Thomas of Hatfield the Kings secretary, by meanes of the Kings letters to the Pope: And when certaine of the Cardinalles saide, that the saide Thomas was a light person, and a lay man: the Pope answered, truely, if the King of England at this time had made his request for an asse, hee should haue obtained it. But Richard Bury is somewhat to bee remembred for example to other, hee was borne néere Saint Edmundsbury, by his father Sir Richard Angarvill Knight, and his vncle Sir Iohn Willowby his gouernour he was first set to Grammar schoole, and after sent to Oxford, from whence hee was called to teach Edward of Windlesore then Prince: afterward this Richard was made principall receiuer to Edward the second in Gascoigne, at such time as yong Edward with his mother fledde to Paris, whose expenses beginning to faile, the said Richard came to them priuily with a great summe of money, for ỹ which cause he was pursued to Paris where he lay hid in a Steeple by the space of seuen dayes. After this he was made Cofferer to Edward the third, then treasurer of the Wardrobe, then clearke of the priuie seale by the space of fiue yéeres, in the which time, twise he went to Pope Iohn. In the fiue and fortieth yéere of his age he was consecrated Bishop of Durham, then was he made Treasurer of England, and after Chancellour, since the which time he was sent thrise to the French King to claime the kingdome of France, and after that, to Antwerpe and other places in Brabant in embassage by the space of nine yéeres, he was greatly delighted in the company of Clearkes, and had alwayes many of them in his family, among whom were Thomas Bradwardine, afterward Archbishop of Canterbury, Richard fitz Ralph Archbishop of Armacham, Walter Burley, Iohn Mandit, Robert Holcot, Richard Kilwington, all of them doctors of diuinitie, Richard Wentworth or Benworth Bishop of London, and Walter Segraue Bishop of Chichester euery day at his table, he was accustomed to haue some reading: and after dinner daily he would haue disputation with his priuate clearkes, and other of his house, except some vrgent cause had let him. At other times he was occupied, either in seruice of God, or at his bookes, wéekely he bestowed for the releise of the poore eight quarters of wheate made into bread, besides the ordinary fragments of his house. Moreouer, in comming or going from Newcastell to Durham, he bestowed sometimes twelue markes in almes, from Durham to Stockton eight markes, from Durham to Aukland fiue markes, from Durham to Middleham an hundred shillings, &c. He was so delighted in Bookes, that he had more (as was thought) then all the Bishops of England besides, he bestowed many rich ornaments on the Church of Durham, he builded an hall or house in Oxford, indowing it with reuenues needefull for his schollers. The same yeere died Henry Earle of Lancaster, father to Henry Earle of Darby, and was buried at Leicester, in the monastery of chanons, the king and both the olde and yong Quenes being present, with Archbishops, Bishops, Earles and Barons, in manner of all the land, whose sonne was then in Gascoine doing chiualrious acts. Henry Earle of Lancaster deceased.

This yeere the Scots, to the number of thirtie thousand, William Dowglas being their leader, entred into Westmerland, and brent Carleile, Penreth, with many other townes, wherefore the Bishop of Carleile, with Thomas Lucy, Robert Ogle, and a great number, compassed them in the night season, and with lights and noise so disquieted them, that they neuer durst goe out for victualles, nor giue their bodies to sleepe, but at the last Alexander Stragan stoutely prepared to goe out for victualles, whom the Bishop and Robert Ogle mette, and with a speare thrust him through the body, so that the Scots were sone after ouercome and slaine. The Earle of Northampton, and the other Lords in Brytaine committed certaine castels wonne by them in Brytaine, to the safekeeping of the faithfull captaines and souldiours, and then returned into England. An. reg. 20.

King Edward prepared to make a voyage into Normandy, his nauy being ready to transport him from Portesmouth and Porchester, with the Earles of Northampton, Arundell, Warwike, Harecourt, Huntingdon, Orenford, and Suffolke, the Bishop of Durham, and Maister William Killesby clearke, euery one of these leading a great army of souldiours well appointed, were embarqued, and waited for the winde, from the first of June, to the fift of July, and then hauing a good winde, they beganne to make saile with the number of one thousand shippes of burthen and pinases, and on the thirtenth day of July, they landed at Hogges in Normandy, where on the shoare of the Sea, King Edward made his eldest sonne knight, and also Prince of Wales, and immediately the Prince made knights, Mortimere, Montacute, Rose, and other. 1346. The night following King Edward lodged in Mercels, where he stayed fiue dayes, during which time, all the Countrey, with the Towne of Barbefleete, was by his men consumed with fire. From thence they departed to Meloigus, which they set on fire: then they went to Senet combde Mount, which is nigh the sea, and to Garantam, thence to Serius, and to Saint Lewes, passing along vnto the towne of Tourney, wasting all with fire, and that night the King lodged at Carnalin, then to Gerin, being a religious house

After ward they made an assault, and entred the City of Cane, making their entrance by a bridge which was strongly defended.

There was slaine an hundreth three and fourtie Knights, among the which was taken the Earles of Ewe, and Camberlin de Tankeruill, with diuers other captaines, and of them of the Citie, were slaine aboue one thousand three hundred.

At this Citie the armie remained fiue dayes, and the spoile thereof they sold to those mariners which followed the coast as the King went. Then they went to the monasterie in the Towne of Toward, a verie strong thing, and well defended. After ward, they came vnto Argons by night, burning still as they went, till they came to the Citie of Licens, where they found the Cardinalles of Clarimount, and of Naples, and one archbishop, who offered the King a treatie of peace, and there the King continued three dayes, refusing to treate of peace. Then they went to Lassentnoland, and to the Towne of Brine, and lodged at New Burge, and after at Seleleke vpon Sayne, and there the Welchmen swamme through the water of Segan, and being resisted by the inhabitants, they slewe many of them. Then they passed nigh to the towne and Castell of Pount March, being strong places, and not assaultable. This night he lodged at Lury vpon Segan, nigh vnto the good Towne of Louars, which they did burne. After, they passed by the towne and castell of Gallon, which they toke, and brent, and lodged at Lingeuie, which is nigh the good towne and Castle of Vernon, which they touched not, and there they first entred into Fraunce, and the same night they brent the Castell of Roche Blanch, which standeth on the other side of Segan, and lodged at Fremble vpon Segan. After that they passed by the Towne of Paunt, lodging that night at Dpoyne. On the next day they passed to Frigmas, and the next day to the good towne of Poecie, where being a bridge to passe ouer the riuer of Segan, the French had spoyled it, but the King caused it to be redified: and the nexte day they came to Amias, where were three Armies appointed to kepe the king from passing that way: but he slew three hundred of them at the first charge, put the residue to flight, and spoyled their tentes, burning three hundreth and two cartes and wagons laden with crossebowes, quarrels, armour and victualles: the King staying there two dayes, they went to Gressle nigh vnto Pountoys, then to Antell: the next day they passed by the Citie of Wenneys, which they touched not, and so by Trosolours at the water of Some, where they lodged.

(h. 4. Emp.r of Germany he was son to John 4.e Blind K. of Bohemia & chosen a yeare before Lewis's death

The next day they wanne the towne of Poys, and brent the castell. From thence they went to Aregnus, then to Achen, where they lodged. The nexte day they came to Noell vpon the sea side, the French men of Dabuile and the countrey came to the fordes side to hinder their passage, with whom the King had a sore conflict, but the enemies were put to the worse, and more then two thousand slaine, and the Towne of Croytoy taken and brent, and aboue three hundred Germaines slaine.

The nexte day they followed the King on the riuer of Some, and on the banks banks side (where the King with his hoste were lodged) came traueling Philip de Valoys the French King, with the Kings of Boheme and Malegre, leading an armie of men innumerable, diuided into eight great battelles. King Edward sent to the French King, offering him free passage ouer the foorde, if he would come and chose a place apt to fight a field in, but this Phillip went to another place of passage. Th. de la More.

On the morrow King Edward remoued to Crecifield, where the armie of the French King met him. The King therefore set his sonne the Prince of Wales to gouerne the vaward. The middle warde the earle of Northampton. The third he toke to guide himselfe. Battell of Cressy.

The armie of the Frenchmen were deuided into nine troupes. The vaward was committed to the King of Boheme. The French King commaunded his banner called Oriflame to be set vp, after which time it was not lawfull vnder paine of death to take any man to saue his life. The French banner of oriflame signified no mercy more the fire in oile.

This banner, that it might differ from his standert, had in it lillies of gold very broad.

On the other side, King Edward cammanded his banner to be erected of the dragon, which signified fiercenesse and cruelty to be turned against the lillies.

These armies being thus appointed, stode in the fielde from one of the clocke vntill the euening. About the Sunne setting, after the armies had iuted, they beganne by the sound of Trumpets to giue signe of battaile, but they themselues felt the force of the English Archers, and as for their quarrels, they fell short a great way. Moreouer, their fotemen being placed among their owne horsemen, were by them (when they were gauled with the English shotte of arrowes) ouerrunne and troden vpon, that a great outcry was made as it were to the starres, and the whole forme of the array was broken, and they fighting with the English armed men, are beaten downe with polares.

In this so terrible a bickering, the Prince of Wales being then but fiftenth yeres old, shewed his wonderfull to wardnesse, laying on very lotely with speare and shielde. This battell dured three partes of the night, in the which time the Frenchmen gaue fiue great assaults against our men, but at the length they being conquered, ran away.

On the morrow, there came foure armies of freshe souldiours to the French side, and making semblance as though their part had suffered no harme, they came against the Englishmen, and gaue them a fresh battell. On the other side, the Englishmen withstood them very stoutely, and after a sharpe conflict they forced their foes to flie, and in chasing of them together with them that were slaine in the conflict, they slewe three thousand men in the said two dayes. There were slaine in the battaile of Crecie, the King of Boheme and of Malorite, the Archbishop of Rainis, the Bishop of Noyone, the Dukes of Loraine & Burbon, the Earles of Alanson, Harecourt, Aumarle, Sauoy, Fois, Bomibillard, Pinars, and of Flanders, with the grand Prior of the hospitall of Fraunce, and 4000. men of armes, beside common souldiors without number.

The third day after, king Edward paſſed by the Abbey of Pountney, and the next day they came to the town of Pountney, & from thence to the Nunrie of Saint Ioice, and after they paſſed ouer a fourde, and came to Newcaſtle, where they ſtayed two dayes, and from thence they came to Caleis, which preſently they entrenched to beſiege, being the fourth day of September.

King Edward beſieged Caleis.

The French king in this meane time ſent a number of Genowayes, and other hired ſouldiours, vnto Dauid king of Scots, earneſtly requeſting him that he would inuade England with all his force: wherefore about the 7. of October, he with a mighty power entred England, paſſing along by Berwike, which was ſtrongly defended by the Engliſhmen, and ſo ranging ouer the foreſt of Alnewike, they wonne a certaine mannour place called Luden, belonging to the Lord Walter Wake, who yelded himſelfe on condition to be ranſomed, where (Selby a knight being deſirous by law of armes to ſaue his life) he was taken, which when it was known to Dauid, he commanded him to be ſlaine: but Selby intreated for him, that he might be brought aliue to the preſence of Dauid, who hauing obtained his requeſt, he falleth downe before Dauid, requeſting his life for ranſome, but he was againe adiudged to die. The malice of the tyrant was ſuch, that he commanded two of the children of the poore knight to be ſtrangled in ſight of their father, and afterwards himſelfe being almoſt madde for ſorrow, was beheaded.

Sir Walter Wake and his ſonnes cruelly ſlaine by the Scottes.

From thence the Scots paſſed forward, waſting along the Countrey, wherein were many farmes belonging to the monaſterie of Durham, & coming within two miles of Durham, they tooke certaine of the Monks, which they kept priſoners, for their ranſome, making couenant with the reſidue for a certaine ſumme of money and corne to redéeme their mannours from ſpoyling. The Engliſhmen of the marches fléeing before the face of the enemie, William de la Zouch, Archbiſhop of Yorke, vicegerent to the king in the marches, calling together the biſhop of Carleile, the Earle of Anguiſe, the Lord Mowbray, the Lord Henry Percy, the Lord Ralph Neuel, Ralph Haſtings, with all their ayde, together with the archers of Lancaſhire, went towards the armie of the Scots, and on the éeuen of Saint Luke, met them at a place called Bewre Parke, néere Neuils Croſſe. The Scottiſh nation not accuſtomed to flée, withſtode them ſtoutely, and hauing head-péeces on their heads, and targets on their armes, preaſing ſore vpon the Engliſhmen, they abode the brunt of the archers: but the men of armes which were in the foreſtonts, gaue their enemies many deadlie wounds. The Marſhall of the Scottes, Earle Patrike, who had the charge of the rereward, when he perceiued his men to be beaten downe, he fled away with other that were priuie to his cowardlines: he being fled, the reſidue of the Scottes continuing faithfully with their king, ſtode about him like a round Tower, keeping him in the middle, who ſo continued till there was fewer left aliue, of the which not one of them could eſcape away.

Battell of Durham.

At length Dauid their king valiantly fighting and ſore hurt, an Eſquire of Northumberland, named Iohn Copland tooke him, who with eight of his ſeruants rode ſtraite out of the field with the king, and ſo rode fiftéene leagues from from that place, to a castle called Dirgalus, the residue about him being taken or slaine, the Englishmen pursued the chase after them which were fled, slaying and taking them as farre as Pandilon and Corbridge. In this great battell were taken Dauid de Bruse king of Scottes, the Earle of Mentise, the Earle of Fife, the Lord Malcolm Flemming, the Earle Wipton, William Dowglas, William de Lemingstone, Walter de Halliburton, John Dowglas, Dauid de Anade, John de Saint Clere, William Mowbray, Dauid fitz Robert, William de Ramsey, Adam Moygne, John Steward, Roger de Kirkpatrike, John Hume, and William Morrey knights, Iames Sudelsloure, Iames Loren, Henry Delker Baronets. There were slaine in this battell the Earle of Mouse, the Earle of Straterne, also Alexander Stragy, John de Halliburton, Henry de Ramsy, Naso de Ramsy, Adam Nilkenson, Thomas Boid, John Stiward, Allan Stiward, Dauid de la Hay, Edward Keth, John Crawford, John de Kindesey, Philip de Maldren, Henry Ramsey, Alexander Morey, Humfrey de Bois, Gilbert Inchmarten, Robert Maltallent, and his brother Humfrey Kirkepatrike, John Strange, and Patrike Hearing knights. There were many slaine in the chase, but there were no more coate armours found in the maine battell then we haue reckened.

King of Scots taken by John Copland Esquire.

This battell was fought on the seuenteenth of October. The prisoners were conueyed to London about Christmasse, Dauid le Bruse except, which might not trauell by reason of two deadly wounds in his head with arrowes, but the second of Januarie he was brought vp, and conueyed from Westminster to the Tower of London, in sight of all the people, and there lodged in the blacke noke of the said Tower, neere to the Constables guard, there to be kept. About the feast of S. Mathie the Apostle, the Earle of Fife was at Londraun, headed and quartered, his head set on London Bridge, his quarters set vp in foure parts of the Realme.

John Copland, that toke Dauid de Bruse king of Scottes at the battell of Durham (for so is it called in the Record) for his seruice, king Edward made him a banneret, and gaue him for his maintenance in that state fiue hundred pounds by yeare, after this manner, to wit, foure hundred poundes out of the custome of the Citie of London, and one hundred pounds out of his custome of the Towne of Warwike vpon Twide, vntill such time as fiue hundred pound lands by yeare were giuen to him and his heires for euer. And more for his good seruice with one hundred men of armes, one hundred pound the yeare, out of the custome of the kings port of Newcastle vpon Tine, till the said John had prouided for him and his heires one hundred pound land by yeare.

John Copland rewarded. Record.

While these things were done in England, the king was busied at the siege of Caleis, which Towne is situated in the marches of Artoys, being closed about with a double wall, and a double ditch, hard on the shore of the English sea, right ouergainst the castle of Douer. And there is belonging to the same towne an hauen, wherein ships may lie very safe without danger. This towne was sometime with the castle thereof very strongly built by the force and valiantnes of the Romans, for after that Iulius Cæsar had brought all Fraunce vnder his subiection, he built Caleis in Artoys, and the castle of

The Norman pirats at ſundry times tooke 15. of his ſhips, whereof ſome of them they carried away for their owne occupying, the other they brent, and ſir Thomas Haclut, with ſir William Bolton knights, as they were ſailing into England, were taken priſoners on the ſea. King Edward hauing fortified the ſiege, lay without giuing any aſſault, knowing that it was not poſſible to fight with his enemies without great loſſe of men, conſidering the depth of the ditches, and height of the walles: neither would he erect any engines againſt the towne, for there wanted firme ground whereupon to place them. Beſides that, if he ſhould beate downe the walles, yet were the ditches ſo deepe, and full of ſalte water let in on euery ſide, that they were able to withſtand all the world, with little ſtrength and defence. On that ſide of the Towne on which the Bolloners were wont to victuall Caleis, that is along on the Sea ſide, and eſpecially when the ſhippes could not be ſuffered to paſſe by Sea, but alongſt the ſhoare with ſmall boates, the Earle of Northampton made a rampire, where with he kept away, & beat backe ſuch boates, & afterward when the Admirall of France had purpoſed to come with his ſhips of war to fight againſt our Engliſh ſhips that lay at the ſiege, thinking, ỹ in the meane time, whilſt they were in fighting, the ſmall boates ſhould paſſe to Caleis with victuals, the ſaid Earle of Northampton meeting with him valiantly, put him to flight.

On monday next before the feaſt of Saint Iames, the French King came to the caſtle of Guyſnes, with his eldeſt ſonne Iohn, and the Kings ſonne of Boheme: and a great power, to haue remoued the ſiege from Caleis. Alſo the Emperour (promiſing by othe, that he would remoue the ſiege either by warre or peace, or at the leaſt, he would victuall them that were beſieged) came with his army towards the Engliſh campe, and lodged ſcarce a mile from thence, requeſting by meſſengers a treatie of peace. Hee ſent the Duke of Detenes, and the Earles of Bulone and Darminake, who parleing with the Duke of Lancaſter, the Earles of Northampton and Huntington, touching a truce, could not obtaine their conſent, whereupon after they had exerciſed a little warlike iuſting, they returned to their Tents. The ſecond day following, the French king offered the king of England a day of battell, which the king on certaine conditions accepted very gladly. In the meane ſeaſon, they which were beſieged, made known their ſtate to ỹ French king by ſignes and tokens, for at his firſt comming, they within the Towne ſet vp his ancient on the chiefeſt tower of the caſtle, and alſo they ſet out banners of the Dukes and Earles of France, and a little after the ſhutting in of the euening, they made a great light on the top of one of the higheſt towers, which was towards the army of the Frenchmen, & therewithal they made a great

At the last, the day of battell drew on, against which time, there came out of England and Dutchland, toward the helpe of King Edward 17000. fighting men, whereupon the French King betimes in the morning of the second daye of August, making fire in his tents, fledde, whose taile the Duke of Lancaster and Earle of Northampton cutting off, they slewe and toke many of them.

The French King flieth. W. Norwell.

When they of Calais perceiued this, they toke their standart downe, and with great sorow cast it from the Tower, downe into the ditch, and on the Saterday following, Iohn de Vienna their Captaine, a man very skilfull in warlike affayres, opening the gates of the Towne, came out to the King of England, sitting on a little nagge, for that hee being lame on his feete could not well goe, with an halter about his necke, with the other burgesses and souldiours following on foote, bare headed, and bare foted, hauing halters about their neckes.

The order how Calais was yeelded.

The Captaine comming thus before the King, offered him a warlike sworde, as vnto the chiefest Prince of armes amongst all Christian Kings, and as one that had taken that Towne from the mightiest Christian King by noble chiualry. Then he deliuered to him the keyes of the towne. Thirdly, he requesting of him pitie, asked pardon, and deliuered him the sworde of peace, wherewith he should giue right iudgement, spare and forbeare the humble and lowly, and chasten the proude hearted.

The King receiuing that which was offered him, sent the Captaine with fiftene Knights, and as many Burgesses into England, enriching them with large gifts. The common sort of people, and such as he found in the Towne, being some what refreshed with the Kings almes, he commaunded to be safe conducted to the castle of Guisnes.

After the taking of the towne of Calais, the souldiers at the kings commandement toke the Manor of Marks and of Hoy, and with great difficulty: they built in them Forts, setting in order where walles wanted, hoggesheds filled with stones against the enemies, whilest the walles were a building within. Immediatly after the taking of Calais, there began in those parts a generall pestilence of the flixe, comming from the east parts, into many other parts of the world, whereupon it came to passe, that a great multitude of people dyed. This pestilence gaue occasion that certaine Cardinals were sent on the behalfe of the French King, to craue a truce from that time, vnto the feast of Saint Barnabe next following, which was agreed vpon on the eight and twenty of September.

The truce being taken as afore is saide, King Edward built a Castle at Risbanke betwixt the towne of Calais, and the hauens mouth, to the intent to keep off all the enemies force of ships from the said town: & he made Captaine

An. reg. 22.

This peace being made, it seemed through England as a new Sommer had followed, because of the plentie of all things, for there was no woman of any name, but she had some of the pales of Cane and Caleis, or of other cities beyond the Seas, whereof the matrones being proud, did bragge in French matrones apparell.

Commodities of peace.

At the feast of Easter, James Dowglas, who was taken at Durham in the warres, and brought to London with the king of Scottes, was licenced to depart home againe, swearing to the king peace and fealtie, who afterwards living peaceably in the Marches, and being requested by William Dowglas to ride a hunting with him, was by him comming behind his backe most trayterously slaine.

After Easter, the king held a councell, wherein it was decreed that none of his seruants should take vp any victuals of any man against his will, nor but that he payd for it readie money, vpon paine to bee punished and banished the court, Richard Talbot high Steward of the Kings house being appointed to see execution of that proclamation.

The Earle of Ments was racked, arreigned, and conuicted, for that contrarie to his faith and homage sworne to the King of England, he did againe beare armes against him, and for that fact he was drawne, hanged, and quartered. To this councell came two Earles, and two clearkes sent from the Princes electors, signifying that their election was made to the King, for the dignitie of the kingdome of Almaine. These messengers the King receiued with due honor, but answered them, that he would not take so greate honour vpon his shoulders, vntill he had the crowne of France, due vnto him, in peaceable possession.

K. Edward elected King of Almaine.

Justing at Lincolne.

A little after Easter, there were great Justings holden at Lincolne by the Duke of Lancaster, where were present many Ladies, with the Countesse, and also certaine messengers sent from the King of Spaine, for the lady Isabell daughter to the King, that should be maried to their master the Kings sonne, whome her husband meeting, she died of the great pestilence, so that he followed her to the graue.

The same yeere, K. Edward with his eldest sonne the Earle of Warwike, and the bishop of Winchest. went to Caleis, from whence the King sent the Duke of Lancaster to Denemere, to receiue in his behalfe fealtie and homage of the earle of Flanders, which thing was by the said earle performed. Tho. de la More. Great Pestilence. Tho. Walsing.

There began amongst the East Indians and Tartarians a certaine pestilence, which at length waxed so general, infecting the middle regio of the ayr so greatly, that it destroyed the Saracens, Turks, Syrians, Palestinians, the the Grecians, with a wonderfull, or rather incredible death, in so much that those peoples being exceedingly dismaid with the terrour therof, consulted amongst themselues, & thought it good to receiue the Christian faith & Sacraments, for they had intelligence that the Christians which dwelt on this side the Grecish sea, were not so greatly (more then common custome was) troubled with sicknesse and mortalitie. At length this terrible slaughter passed ouer into those Countries which are on this side the Alpes, and from thence to the partes of Fraunce, which are called Hesperia, and so by order along into Germany and Dutchland. And the seuenth yeere after it began, it came into England, and first began in the townes and ports toyning on the Sea coasts, in Dorsetshire, where, euen as in other Countries, it made the Country quite void of inhabitants, so that there were almost none left aliue.

From thence it passed into Deuonshire, and Somersetshire, euen vnto Bristow, and raged in such sort, that the Glocestershire-men would not suffer the Bristow-men to haue any accesse vnto them, or into their Countrey by any meanes: but at length it came to Glocester, yea and to Oxford, and London, and finally it spred ouer all England, and so wasted & spoyled the people, that scarce the tenth person of all sorts was left aliue: when Church-yards were not sufficient and large ynough to bury their dead in, they chose certaine fields appointed for that purpose.

nie of Henry Duke of Lancaster in his great acts of Gascoine and Guien, after this time made knight of the Garter in England, hauing a respect to the danger that might fall in time of this Pestilence then begunne in England, if the Churches & Church-yards in London might not suffice to burie the multitude, he purchased a peece of ground called Spittle Croft (for that it belonged to the Maister and brethren of S. Bartholomews Spittle) conteining 13. acres and a rodde, without the barres of West Smithfield, & caused the same to be enclosed, and dedicated by Ralph Bishop of London, in the which place in the yeere following, was buried more then fiftie thousand persons, as is affirmed by the kings Charters which I haue seene, and also by an inscription fired on a stone crosse in the same place. And in memorie therof, the same Gualter Mayny caused vpon the same ground a Chappell to be builded, & after founded the same to be an house of Charter-house Monkes, in the yeare. 1371.

Also about the same time, one Iohn Cory procured of Nicholas, Prior of the Church of the Holy Trinitie neere vnto Aldgate, one toft of ground neere vnto East Smithfield, for the buriall of them that died, that it might be called the Church-yard of the holy Trinitie: which ground he caused to be enclosed, and dedicated by Ralph Stratford Bishop of London, in the which place King Edward the third, by consent of the said Prior and Couent, founded the abbey of S. Mary of Grace in the yeere 1359. placing therin an Abbot and Monke of the order of Cisteaux, which were white monks, and named the place Eastminster.

Verie few noble men died, among whom departed Iohn Mongomery, and his Ladie: the Lord Clifteles Captaine of Caleis died at Caleis, and was buried in the white Friers at London. Of the common people, together with Religious and Clerkes, there died an innumerable sort, for no man but God onely knew how many. There died from the first of Januarie, to the first of July, in the Citie of Norwich 57104. persons, besides Ecclesiasticall Mendicants and Dominikes. There was buried in the Church and Church-yard of Yarmouth, in one yeere 7052. men and women, before which time the personage there was worth 700. markes by yéere, and afterwardes was scarse worth fortie pound the yéere. This note was certified to King Heny the seuenth in the 22. of his raigne, & the same is written on the gates of the Church of Yarmouth. This great pestilence began at London about the feast of All Saints, in the yéere 1348. What time this pestilence had wasted all England, the Scots greatly reioycing, mocked and sware oft times by the vile death of the Englishmen: but the sword of Gods wrath, slue and consumed the Scots in no lesse numbers, then it did the other. It also wasted the Welsh men, and within a while passed ouer into Ireland, where it destroyed a great number of English people that dwelt there, but such as were right Irishmen borne, that dwelt in the hilly countries, it scarcely touched, so that few of them died therof. This plague continued sometime in one place, sometime in another, vntill the yéere of our Lord 1357. the same yéere for a truce or finall peace to be concluded, the Bishop of Norwich, the Earle of North-hampton, the Earle of Stafford, Richard Talbot, Walter Mayny knights, sailed ouer the Sea into Fraunce, whom the Frenchmen met peaceably, but they would not agrée to a final peace, vnlesse that Caleis were restored to them againe, which would not be graunted: and the truce which was taken for a yéere was so continued. But the Earle of Flaunders, who would not in any case receiue conditions of peace, vnlesse the French king were quite forsaken, notwithstanding his solemne oath, not long after entred into Flaunders with a great power of Frenchmen, burning & killing where euer he came: but the people of the countrey with a few Englishmen withstood him stoutly, and gaue him a sore skirmish, in the which, beside that many Frenchmen were slain, the earle himselfe was forced to flie, for the which worthy acte, many knightes were made, among st the which was Iohn de Filebert, an English man.

In the feast of the Natiuitie of S. Iohn, the Quéene was purified at Windsore, where were solemne Iusts, and running at the Tilt, at the which, Dauid king of Scots was present, and the Earle of Ewe, the Lord Tankeruill, Lord Charles de Valoys, and many other strangers captiues, who by the kings licence were permitted to runne also at the Tilte, at the which passtime the prise of the field was adiudged to the Earle of Ewe. After in Sommer season, these strangers passed their time in hunting, in the companie of the King, and other nobles of the Realme, at Claringdon in Wilshire nigh Salisburie, and in diuers other forrests.

Whiles the king was thus occupied, the Frenchmen notwithstanding the truce, entred the marches of Britaine, but the sonnes of Sabatier, with a few other, ther, who went out a roraging, toke Thomas Dagworth knight, a man of great experience, who but with a few men, to wet fiften armed men, entred the wod against these robbers, & inuaded them, slaying to the number of three hundred, but at the length being stricken fiue times in ỹ face with quarels, al his men being first slain, he himself was thrust through ỹ body with a sword. About the feast of Saint Michael, more then 120. persons of Seeland, and Holland, comming through Flaunders vnto London, somtime in the Church of Saint Paul, somtime in other places of the citie, twise in the day, in the sight of all people, from the loynes, vnto the heeles, couered in linnen cloth, all the rest of their bodies being bare, hauing on their heads hats with red crosses before and behind, euery one in their right hands a whip with three rods, eech rod hauing a knot in the middest, beate themselues on their bare bloudie bodies going in procession, foure of them singing in their owne language, all the other answering them. The same yeere the Earle of Lancaster, the Barons of Stafford & Greystocke, also the heires of the Lords Percy and Neuell, and the Lord Furnisall with Bartholmew Burwash, and diuers other, about the feast of all Saintes, passed ouer sea into Gascoigne, to delay the furious vprore that Iohn de Valois sonne to the French king had made in that Dukedome, greatly spoyling and wasting the same. Also the kings Counsel ordained, that none of the kings iustices during the time of their offices, should receiue any fee, gift, or reward of any man, except it were of the king himselfe.

Also this yeere in the Countie of Orford, nigh vnto a Towne called Chippingnorton, there was found a serpent hauing two heads, and faces like women, one being shaped after the new tyre of that time: another after the manner of the old attire, and it had great wings, after the manner of a Flindermouse or Bat. Thomas Bradwarden Archbishoppe of Canterburie deceased, Simon Islip succeeded. A serpent with two heads in Oxfordshire.

About the feast of All Saints, king Edward being accompanied with the Earles of Lancaster, and Suffolke, and diuers others, passed ouer the seas into Flaunders, and thence leading his armie towards Fraunce, the Frenchmen made meanes vnto him to renewe their truce: and now the Earle of Flaunders submitted himselfe the third time vnto the kings mercie & dominion. Then the king returning toward England, to solemnizate the translation of Saint Thomas the Confessour and Bishop of Hereford, did with his presence and Nobilitie honor the same, to the great expences of Nicholas Cantulupus Baron, and cousin to the said Saint Thomas: during which feast and solemnitie, it was signified to the king by the Secretaries of Emericus of Padua, who was a feed man to the king of England, that on the fourteenth day of Januarie next comming, Geffrey Charney knight, and many other French men should be receiued into Calcis, vnto whom the said towne was solde by the said Emericus: but the Towne being presently rescued by king Edwarde, the said Emericus of Padua with other Genoways continued in Calcis, being maintained there at the costs of the French king against the king of England, when he besieged it, who also after the yeelding of it to the king of England, R. Edward sailed towards Flaunders. Calais like to haue been betraied.

being pardoned both of life and limme, from thencefoorth continued and dwelt as a feed man of the kings in the said Towne for the defence thereof. At that time the said Geffrey was Lord of Matas, a man more skilful in warfare then any Frenchman in Fraunce. Wherefore he was greatly estéemed, euen to the time of his death. This craftie deuiser indeuoured by his letters, wherein hée made promise of large giftes of gold, and other sophisticall perswasions, quite to subuert the faith and loyaltie of the said Emericus.

Finally, this craftie deuiser agréed with this false man, that for twentie thousand French crownes he should let in the Frenchmen to the Town, and as much as lay in him, deliuer vp to the Frenchmen both the Towne and Castle. This bargaine being most traiterously made, by oath and breaking of the Sacrament betwixt them, yet al this notwithstanding, he wrote letters vnto the king touching the state of the whole matter, but very priuily, how that he was readie to shew friendship to the Frenchmen, yet meaning to make frustrate their purpose, whereby they should be conuicted of breaking the truce, and also many of them should bee taken to bee raunsomed, wherefore king Edward spéedily passed ouer, being accompanied with his eldest sonne, the Earle of March, and a few other, comming before the time appointed for the yeelding of the Towne, certaine daies. Therefore being come to Calais, hee laid certaine men of armes within the Vaultes which were betwixt the outter gate and the inner parte of the Castle, building a thinne and slender Wall before them newly set vp, not made of plaister, but of counterfaite matter, which ioyned to the other Wall, craftily deuised and made like the olde woorke, so that no man would iudge that any were enclosed therein.

Also hée caused the maine postes of the drawe bridge to bee sawed almost in sunder, yet in such sorte, that armed Horse-men might ride ouer it: and for the purpose he had a great stone, which was laid vp in a hole made in form of an arch, being in the forepart of the Tower hanging ouer the Bridge, in which he appointed a faithfull Souldier should bee in due time to throwe downe the said stone vpon the Bridge, that with the fall thereof, the Bridge being halfe cut in two, should bee broken in sunder, and so that hole where the stone was laid, should hée wrought in such sort, that bee within shoulde perceiue through the hole how many did enter in: fewe were made priuie to this practise, neither did many know of the kings presence or of the Prince of Wales, who when they had wrought this feate, secretly conueied themselues into the Towne.

The day before the time of deliuerie of this Towne, Geffrey Cherney sent fifteene of his faithfullest men with the greater parte of the golde which was to bee paide, who should also trie the faith of Emericus, and the order of the Castle, who searching euerie where, in euerie Tower and corner which they could finde open, could perceiue nothing contrarie to their liking, whereupon on the next day in the morning, they set vp the French Kings standerde in the highest Tower of the Castle, and the ancients also of Geffrey, and of other Lords vpon other Towers and places. Then the people of the Towne who kept common watch and ward, not knowing of this secrete deuise, were greatly terrified therewith, in so much that they taking weapon in hand, began to giue a charge against the Castell: by and by the French men who had entred the day before, toke Thomas Kingstone, then flée-ing away, quite ignorant of that which was deuised, and forceably they set him in the stockes. Then certaine of them being sent out to the French men their companions and maisters, who lay without in ambushes shewed them the ancients and standard set vp, and all to be well, euen as they would haue it, hastening them forward to come to the defence of the Castle, against the townes men: wherefore they rising from their lurking places, aduanced themselues in pride and bragging, and came by heapes in at the gates of the Castle. The townes men perceiuing this, had much adoe to forbeare their hands from them, had not their chiefe leaders withdrawen them from it, least some danger should haue happened to them that lay hid: by and by those that lay hid closed vnder the arches of the walles, prepared themselues to breake out vpon their enemies. In like sort also he that with the great stone was shut vp in ỹ hole, after that he saw so many entred in, estéeming that his fellowes were sufficient to ouerthrow them, with that great stone put to his custodie he brake the draw bridge, by the which the enemies had entred in, but being once in could not goe that way out againe: when the stone was thus downe, and had discharged the thing for the which it was laid vp, and the French men deceiued by that policie, they were enclosed safe ynough. At the noyse of this stone and the bridge that brake, these armed men of whom before I spake, breaking downe their counterfaite wall, behinde the which all the deceite was hid, they presently set themselues in order to inuade the French men, bitten to a bitter breakfast. The conflict was sharpe for a good season, but at the length the enemies being ouercom, yelded themselues to the pleasure of the Conquerours. They which were without and had not entred, as sone as they perceiued their companions to be deceiued, fled, after whom the King with scarce fiue hundred men of armes and as many archers followed apace, the runnawayes not knowing what companie would follow them: many in this chase were wearied, and many mo slaine, and in a small time the King ouercame daungerous and great labours: but at length, when it was vnderstood by them that fled, how few there were that chased them, foure score armed men turned them against the King. I dare not ascribe this boldnesse of the King in chasing of his enemies, to his wisdome, but onely to the stoutnesse of this minde, the which is well knowen through Gods grace to be brought to good effect by his meanes, though the daunger were neuer so great: for when he perceiued that the French men had turned themselues to withstand him, he cast away the scabard of his sword, and comforting his men about him, setting them in good order, exhorted them to play the men lustily. The Archers being placed in the Marish against the sides of the enemies stood on drie hilles, which were compassed about with quagge-myres and foggie places, that neither Horsemen nor foote-men might approch them, but they should rather be drowned in mudde then come néere to hurt them: these also did the King comfort, Tho. de la More saying to them (doe well you Archers) play the men lustily, and know we that I am Edward of Windsore. When the presence of the king, and necessitie of the matter, stirred vp their hearts to doe well: the Archers vncouering their heads, stripping vp their slæues, bent themselues to bestow their arrowes in such sorte that they might not be lost: and as the French men drew towards them, they saluted them after with their arrowes. The armed men of both parts stood in order to fight vpon a long and narrowe causeway, the breadth whereof was not able to receiue scarce twentie men of armes in a front, hauing on both sides thereof the Marish, in the which the Archers were placed, who gawled and wounded their enemies on the sides, slæing as thicke as haile. The king and his men before with the Archers on the side, slewe and toke a great many: and many of them stood stoutly to it, till at the length by the comming of the Prince of Wales, the French were put to flight: after a long chase in pursuing the enemies, they returning backe againe to Caleis, numbred those which were sled, as well as those which were taken, and they found, that for the taking of the Castle (as the prisoners reported) there came a thousand men of armes, and fiue hundred armed men, but they which serued, were aboue three thousand: among them which were taken, was Geffery Charney and his sonne, Edward de Renty, Robert Danquile, Otto de Gulo, the Baron of Partingham, Baldyna Saylly, Henry de Prees, Garinus Baylose, Peter

There were slaine in the 1350. skirmish the Lord Henry de Boys, the Lord Archibalde, and many others, whose names the Conquerours were not able to certifie. Thus by politike and deuised treason the authours thereof came to death and destruction: neither Eustachius himselfe escaped scotfræ from the snares, for he within a while after being taken by the Frenchmen, was burned aliue with a hot yron, and degraded from the order of knighthood by the cutting off of his heeles, & depriuing of his tongue by abscition: afterward, he was hanged vp, and last of all beheaded and quartered, receiuing iust punishment for his treason and false forswearing.

All these together with the King were clothed in gownes of Russet, powdered with garters blew, wearing the like garters also on their right legges, and mantels of blew, with scutcheons of S. George. In this sort of apparell they being bare-headed, heard Masse, which was celebrated by Simon Islip Archbishop of Canterbury, & the Bishops of Winchester and Excester, and afterwards they went to the feast, setting themselues orderly at the table, for the honor of the feast, which they named to be of S. In the Sommer following, variance rising betweene the fléets of England and Spaine, the Spaniards beset the Britaine Sea, with 44. great ships of warre, with the which they sunk ten English ships comming from Gascoigne towards England, after they had taken and spoyled them, and thus their former iniuries being reuenged, they entred into Sluce in Flanders.

King Edward vnderstanding hereof, furnished his naule of fiftie shippes and Pinaces, for recalking to méete with the Spaniards in their return, hauing in his company the Prince of Wales, the Earles of Lancaster, North-hampton, Warwicke, Salisburie, Arundale, Huntington, Gloucester, and other Barons and Knights with their seruants and archers, and vpō the feast of the decollation of S. Iohn, about Euensong time, the Nauies mette at Winchelsea, where the great Spanish vessels surmounting our ships and foystes, like as castles to cotages, sharpely assailed our men, ỳ stones and quarels flying from the tops, sore and cruelly wounded our men, who no lesse busie to fight alwe with launce and sword, and with the forewards manfully defend themselues, at length our Archers pearced their Arbalisters with a further retch then they could strike againe, and thereby compelled them to forsake their place, and caused other fighting from the hatches to shade themselues with tables of the Ro. de Auesbury. The night ouerpassed, the English men prepared (but in vaine) to a new battell, but when the sunne began to appeare, they viewing the seas, could perceiue no signe of resistance, for 27. ships flying away by night, left 17. spoiled in the euening, to the Kings pleasure, but against their will.

Philip the French king died.

Combat before king Edward.

Two hyred souldiers of the King of Armenia, came into England, into the presence of the King, where they shewed the letters of the aforesaid King of Armenia, wherein it was signified that the one of them, to wit, Iohn de Viscount, a man borne in Cipres, had slanderously charged the other, that is Thomas de la March, a French man borne, and bastard sonne to Philip late King of France, saying that the said Thomas should haue receiued of the Turkes a certaine summe of gold, for the betraying the armie of the Christians vnto the Emperour of the Turkes: and for the proofe of this slander, this John challenged a combate with the said Thomas, to be tried by the iudgement of Edward King of England, and that by him (as by a most worthie Prince,) all strife should be ended. For this therefore were these two worthie souldiers appointed to fight, which they performed within the lists of the Kings palace at Westminster, on Munday next following after the feast of Saint Michael, where Thomas, in declaration of his innocencie, in that he was accused of, ouercame his enemie, but yet killed him not, for he could not, because he was not able to wounde him being so armed, with any kinde of piercing weapon, except it were in his face, which was bare. For after that they had runne at the Tilte, and fought on foote, as they were striuing together on the ground, with certaine prickes both short and sharpe, then called Gadlings, being closed in the toyntes of his right gauntlet, the said Thomas stroke the said John in the face, and sore wounded him: but on the other side John had no such short kinde of weapon, wherewith he might hurt Thomas face, and therefore cryed out aloude most horribly, whereupon by the Kings commaundement the Combate was ended, and the victorie adiudged to Thomas, who gaue the said John, being thus ouercome, to the Prince of Wales for a Captiue, and offered vppe his owne armour to Saint George, in Saint Pauls Church at London, with great deuotion. These matters being thus finished, finished, the Cipres man is manumitted and set at libertie as a free man againe. And Thomas thinking boldely to goe into the presence of his brother the French King, toke his iourney thither, and at his comming, found the said King and the Nobilitie of Fraunce, greatly offended, and in indignation against him, for that he agréed that the combate should be tried before the King of England. Wherefore Thomas thinking secretly with himselfe how to winne the false friendship of his brother, being desirous to shew that therein he had done well, among all other things he greatly praised the nobilitie of Edward and his worthie fame spread ouer al the world, and also the iustice which he vsed in iudging, not accepting the person of the man of Cipres, (yea though hee loued the king himselfe very well) neither suffered him to be preferred before me, which am a Frenchman, and brother, and friend to thée my Lord King of Fraunce, iudge ouer the sayd King Edward my aduersarie. Also the Earle of Ewe highly praised the King of England, for that he had receiued great comfort and commoditie at his hands during the time of his Captiuitie in England, shewing also how farre that good King had banished enuie and hatred from his heart, who at a time of iusting, being in the field at that exercise, and the King also, was commaunded by the King himselfe to beare away the price and pricke from them all. These commendations did the French King enuie at, and for indignation, hee most wickedly commaunded the setters forth of those prayses to bee beheaded. And for to colour the matter the better, hée sayned that the Earle vsed too much familiaritie with the Quéene his wife, and that his brother was guiltie of treason against the king of Fraunce, because he committed his cause and the combat to be thus tryed by the iudgement of the King of England. After hee had thus murdered his brother, hee tormented his wife to death by famine, who was daughter of the noble king of Boheme, lately slaine in battaile by Geffrey.

William Edington Bishop of Winchester, and treasurer of England, a wise man: but louing the Kings commoditie, more then the wealth of the realme and common people, caused a new coyne called a Groate, and halfe Groat to be coyned, but these were of lesse waight then the pence, called Esterlings, by reason whereof victuals and merchandise became the dearer thorow the whole realme. After the Octaues of the Purification of our Lady, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, Henry Earle of Lancaster was created Earle of Lincolne, Leicester, Derby, Grosmount and Ferrers, and Duke of Lancaster, vnto whom also was giuen great priuiledges, such as neuer any Earle had before his time. Also Lionel of Antwerpe the kings sonne is made Earle of Ulster in Ireland, Iohn of Gaunt his brother is made Earle of Richmond, and Ralph Baron of Stafford, is made Earle of Stafford. In the Lent following Walter de Maine, and Robert Herle Captaine of Caleis, rode into France, making great praies and doing great domage, brought away great store of beasts, sheepe, and swine, so that at Caleis a fat Cowe was A fat Cowe sixteene pence.

scarcely sold for fifténe pence sterling. About Easter the Duke of Lancaster departing from Calais marched alongst the Sea coasts of Artoys, and Picardie, brent the suburbes of Bulloigne, but assaulting the Towne he preuailed not, for that onely the ladders were too short. Therefore he walked the Cities of Tirwin, and the hauen, also the townes of Fauconbridge and Staples, and in the same hauens he brent about 120. ships of diuers moulds. After this burning the champion countrey, he rode vnto Saint Omers, and winning by force many fortresses, with a great pray and many prisoners he returned to Calais. About the feast of Saint George things prospered well in Gascoine, for the Marshall of France, with a great number of armed men spoyled the countrey about Saint Dangel, where Edmond Rose a Norffolke man was Captaine, who with the garrison, valiantly encountred the enemies, slew many of them, and tooke the said Marshall and many other Nobles of France, chasing aboue 400. Knights.

Bartolus 4. Ciuilia. flor. abt. this time

The same yéere the Spanish ships by a treatie of peace came into England, where the last yéere they were restrained, but now a truce was taken for twentie yéeres, betwixt England and Spaine, and a truce betwixt England and Fraunce for one yéere, which the Frenchmen brake, by reason of taking the Castle of Guisnes, as in the next yéere shall be shewed.

About this season the olde coine of gold was changed into a new, the olde Noble was worth much aboue the tared rate of the new, and therefore the Marchants bought the olde and conueyed them out of the Realme, to the great losse of the king and kingdome, to the which there was a remedie prouided, by changing of the stampe.

An. reg. 26. 1352.

About the beginning of Januarie, the Frenchmen being occupied about the repayring of the walles of Guisnes towne, being afore that time destroyed by the Englishmen, some men of armes of Calais vnderstanding their doings, deuised how they might ouerthrow the worke, in this sort. There was an Archer named Iohn Dancaster, in prison in the castle of Guisnes, before that time taken, who not hauing wherwith to pay his ransome, was let loose, with condition that he should worke there among the Frenchmen. This fellow chanced to lye with a laundres, a strumpet, and learned of her where beyond the principall ditch, from the bottome of the ditch, there was a wall made of two foote broade, stretching from the rampiers, to the brimme of the ditch within forth, so that being couered with water it could not be seen, but not so drowned, but that a man going aloft thereon, should not be wet past the knées, it being made for the vse of Fishers: and therefore in the middest it was discontinued for the space of two foote: and so the Archer (his Harlot shewing it to him) measured the height of the Wall with a threde. These things thus knowne, one day slipping downe from the Wall, he passed the ditch by that hidden Wall, and lying hidde in the Marish till Euening, came in the night néere vnto Calais, where tarying for the cleare day, he then went into the Towne (for else he might not:) here he instructed them that were grédie of pray and to scale the castle, how they might enter the same: they caused ladders to be made to the length by the Archer appoynted. together, clothing themselues in black armour without any brightnesse, went to the Castle by the guiding of the said Iohn de Dancaster, and climing the wall with their ladders, they slew the watchmen, and threw them down headlong beside the Wall: after this, in the Hall they slew many whom the found vnarmed, playing at the Chesse and Hazard. Then they braste into the Chambers and Turrets vpon the Ladies and Knights that lay there asleepe, and so were made maisters of all that was within: and shutting all their prisoners into a strong chamber, being bereft of all their armour, they toke out the English men that had bẽn taken the yẽre before and there kept in prison, and after they had relieued them well with meate and drinke, they made them guardeins ouer them that had them in custodie: & so they wan all the Fortresses of the Castle, vnknown to them that were in the Towne, (appointed to ouersee the repayring of the broken walles) what had happened to them within the Castle. In the morning they commanded the workemen in the towne to cease from their workes, who thereupon perceiuing that the Castle was wonne, straight waies fled, and the new Castilians, suffered the Ladies to depart on horsebacke, with their apparell, writings, and Huniments, where they ought to hold their fées: and the same day there came from Caleis to their ayde such persons as they sent for, by whose ayde they kept the Castle: and about three of the clocke there came two Knights, sent from the Earle of Guisnes, who demanding a truce, willed to know of them that were thus entred the Castle, who they were, to whom they belonged, and by whose authoritie they kept the Castle so taken in the time of truce, whereunto they answered; that being intruded, they would not declare to any man their purpose, till they had tryed a longer possession: and therefore on S. Mawrice day, the Abbot (the King being busie in Parliament,) to the Frenchmen being sent from the sayd Earle of Guisnes, declared, how in preiudice of the truce, the sayd Castle was taken, and therefore by right of mutuall faith it ought to bée restored vnto them. The king answered, that without his knowledge that enterprise was made, and therefore he gaue commandement to his subiects, that none of them should deteine the castle of Guisnes, but deliuer it vnto the lawfull Lords thereof. The messengers being returned home, and reporting what they had done, the Earle of Guisnes commeth to the Castle, demaunding of them within, as at other times, in whose name they kept it. Who constantly affirming that they kept it in the name of Iohn Dancaster, hée required to know if the same Iohn were the King of Englands liegeman, or would obey him: who answering that hée knew not what messengers had bẽn in England: the Earle offered for the Castle, besides all the treasure found in it, many thousands of Crownes, or possessions for exchange, and a perpetuall peace with the King of Fraunce. To this they answered, that before the taking of that Castle they were Englishmen by nation, but by their demerites banished for the peace of the King of England, wherefore the place which they thus held, they would willingly sell or exchange, but to none sooner then to their naturall King of England, to whom they sayd, they would sell their Castle, to obtaine their peace: but if hée would not buy it, then they would sell it to the King of France, or to whom soeuer would giue most for it.

The Earle being thus shifted off from them, the king of England bought it in deede, and so had that place which he greatly desired. The Fortresse was wont to stop vp the passage into the higher Countrey, giuing to some great suerty from the Forragers, that were to issue forth of Calais. The Counsell of Fraunce therefore wishing to haue that Castle againe, or to builde another of like vtilitie, for the defence of the Countrey thereabouts, they sent for Geffrey Charney lately redéemed out of English Captiuitie, with authoritie to build and fortifie as followeth.

Lalbastie fortified.

To them that trauaile from Guisnes to Calais there was a place on the left hand strong, but decayed, hauing a Church, in which certaine Nuns were resident, and it was called Lalbastie: this place was so néere to Guisnes, that the Englishmen standing without the gate of their Fortresse might shote to it. This Monasterie of Nunnes might easily be made defensible, for it had high Walles like a Castle, and a high Towre, and very large for a steeple, and being situate in a marish ground, it might with small labour be compassed with a ditch. This place the Englishmen had spared for deuotion sake, vntill that the foresaid Geffrey, in breach of truce, with a mightie powre besieged Guisnes, and remoued the Nunnes from the Church, making a Castle of the Church, and fensing the Walles with rampire and ditch: and this was about Pentecost, in which season the Waters not impeaching him, his people might worke in the Marish. They within the Castle therefore being besieged, were vnneth able to come abroade with their boates by the ditches that were full of water, and by the Marish vnpassable and also full of water, neither they of Calais could victuall them by any manner of meane, by reason of the siege, and warding that was kept at Lalbastie. They that were thus besieged, oft times sallied out and fought with them of Lalbastie, but fiue very few, sometime with arrowes, and sometime with other weapons: at length, vpon a day appointed, the Calisians, with them of Oye and Markes on the one part, and they within Guisnes on the other, met, set on their enemies, slew many, chased many, and finally burnt vp Lalbastie, and dismanteling the walles, made all plaine with the ground.

Lalbastie burnt and raced.

This yeare, the Duke of Lancaster going into Spruce, by the aduice and ordinance of the king, his daughter was espoused in England to William Duke of Zeland, eldest sonne to Lewis Duke of Bauire, that intruded vpon the Romane Empire.

Walter Bentley, and Robert Knolles make a voyage into France.

About the fiftenth of August, Walter Bentley Captaine, Robert Knolles, and other, in the Marches of Brytaine, valiantly encountred their enemies, where in a fight doubtfull for a good while, were slaine the principall Marshall of France, also the Lords of Quintin, of Curtinoke, of Richmont, of Mount Albon, of Legeuel, of Launey, of Montbech, of Vile Chastel de la March, & other knights, in number 140. and Bachelers, to the number of 500. whose coatearmors were brought away: the number of commons were not counted. There were taken the Lord of Brusebeke, sonne of the Marshall Bertram, also Tristram de Maleis, the Lord of Paletret, the Vicount of Cy-

maine, Geffrey de Graues, William de la Vall, Charles Darchefill, Iohn de Bruſe, and other Knights, with Bachelers, aboue 130. This armie of the French men, vnder the conduct of the ſaid Marſhall, of purpoſe deuiſed by him, was ſo beſet on the backe halfe, with the ſteepeneſſe of a Mountaine, that flie they could not, to the end that hope of flight being taken frō them their courage to fight might the more encreaſe. There were many of thoſe Knights ſurnamed of the ſtarre, who in their profeſſion had conſpired neuer to turne their fearefull backes vpon their enemies, of which number of Knights, there were among them ſlaine and taken, numbred 45. From that dangerous encounter few eſcaped vnhurt, and among other, the foreſaid Walter Bentley Captaine was ſore wounded, who commanded thirtie archers to be condemned, for that in the greateſt heate of the fight they fled. Knights of the Starre.

The Earle of Stafford alſo entred into Gaſcoigne, where encountring with a great armie of the French men that were iſſued forth of the fortreſſe of Gagent, he diſcomfited, tooke, and chaſed them: there was taken that valiant Knight Bruſe Gaude, and ſeuen Knights of the Starre. Shortly after, died Iohn Dediaſeles, and Thomas Wale, Knights of great valour.

The ſame yeere, it being heard that Pirats troubled the Seas, there were ſeuen ſhips of warre ordeyned, certaine Pinaces attending vpon them: ouer the which were admirals, Thomas Cooke, and Richard Tottleſham Knights, who ſcoured the ſeas about the coaſt of Picardy and Normandy, but before the feaſt of S. George, they returned as they wiſhed.

Whileſt theſe things were a doing by Sea and Land, Otto ſonne to the Duke of Brunſwike, the French Kings ſeruant, ſent letters to the Duke of Lancaſter, being returned out of Spruce, by the tenour whereof he accuſed him, affirming that as he returned out of Spruce by Colein, he malicioſly informed the Coloners, that the ſaid Otto went about by ſtealth to haue taken him priſoner, and to haue preſented him to the French king, adding hereunto, that becauſe he neuer ment any ſuch taking of him, he was ready in declaration of his good name, by a ſingular combat onely in the French Kings Court, to proue the Duke of Lancaſter a lyer touching the ſaid article. The letters were not ſealed, and therefore, leaſt it might haue bēn thought folly to haue giuen credite to the letter, deliuered by a ſeruant, the Duke ſent vnto Otto two Knights to learne the cauſe of the chalenge, and to demand thereof his letters patents, ſealed with his ſeale of armes, which Knights accompliſhing the effect of their iourney, and returning with ſpeede, the Duke ſent to the French King for a ſafe conduct for himſelfe and his men, and with much adoe obteining it, he went to Paris, where in the liſts, in preſence of the French King, the King of Nauarre, and the Duke of Burgoigne, and many Peeres, and other of the Realme of Fraunce, he mounted on his ſteed in ſeemely wiſe, ready in all ſignes, without default, to trie the combate, and ſo ſtaid till his aduerſary was ready, and the voyce of the Herault and Canton to be had by their common oath, for the aſſurance of his word, and to obey the Law. On the contrary part, the ſaid Otto ſcarcely was ſet on his Horſe, and was not able decently to ſet on his helmet, nor to weelde his Speare (or elſe he fayned) Otto of Brunſwike chalengeth to combat with the Duke of Lancaſter before the French King at Paris.

Parliament at Weſtminſter. Apparrell appointed to Harlots.

After the Epiphanie, a Parliament was holden at Weſtminſter, wherein an ordinance was made at the inſtance of the Londiners, that no knowne whore ſhould weare from thenceforth any hode, except reped or ſtriped of diuers colours, nor Furre, but garments reuerſed or turned the wrong ſide outward, vpon paine to forfeit the ſame.

S. Stephens Chappell at Weſtminſter. Ex Carta.

King Edward altered the Chappell, which his progenitors before had founded of Saint Stephen at Weſtminſter, into a colledge of twelue ſecular Chanons, twelue Vicars, and other miniſters accordingly, and endued it with reuenues, to the ſumme of fiue hundred pound by yére.

Staples of wool to be kept in England.

The morrow after Saint Mathies day began a Parliament, wherin it was ordeined that the ſtaple of woll before kept in Flaunders at Bridges, ſhould from thenceforth be holden in diuers parts of England, Wales and Ireland, as at Newcaſtle, Yorke, Lincolne, Canterburie, Norwich, Weſtminſter, Chicheſter, Wincheſter, Excester, Briſtow, and Carmarden.

The Earle of Northhampton went into Scotland with a great companie of armed men, and archers, where he rode through the marches, and enforced the caſtle of Loghmaban, and other fortreſſes to yéld, and tok the Scots that were laid in ambuſhes. He alſo held a treatie of peace with the Scots, who gladly would haue redéemed their king, and made a perpetuall peace with the Engliſhmen, but yet ſo as the king of Scots ſhould not hold his land of the king of England.

Treatiſe of peace.

Innocent the firſt, for the deſire of peace, ſent the Cardinall of Bononie to Caleis, to heare the treatie of the finall peace betwixt the kingdomes of England and Fraunce, to whom repaired the Counſellers of both Realmes, with full authoritie to treat and conſtitute the conditions of the ſame peace, and at length they agréed vpon this point, that the king of England ſhould reſigne all his right that he had to the Realme of Fraunce, and remit it to the French king, and ſhould haue therfore the Dutchie of Aquitaine, and the Counties of Artoys and of Guiſnes, for him and his ſucceſſors king of England, without that he ſhould hold the ſame of the French kings in any manner of wiſe.
Ann. reg. 28 To theſe conditions the king of England gaue his conſent, and for the aſſurance of the couenants, Embaſſadours are ſent to the Sea of Rome from eyther Realme. On the king of Englands behalfe went the Biſhoppe of 1354. Norwich, the Duke of Lancaſter, the Earle of Arundell, and other Knights, who going to Auinion, there came to them the Archbiſhoppe of Rohan, the Duke of Burgoine, Geffrey Charney, and other of the French kings

Counſell:

Counsell: all these were receiued in great honour: many Cardinals and Bishops met the duke of Lancaster, who brought him for the space of two miles vnto Auinion, and to the Popes pallace: at length in the Consistorie of the Pope, he with the Cardinalles and Embassadours being present, the causes of their message was declared, and the Embassadours of England requested to haue the couenants confirmed, which had been concluded at Calais: to whom the Frenchmen answered, that gladly they would haue peace, but touching Aquitain, and the foresaid Counties, as they said, the French King could not, nor they might giue their assents that the same should be alienated from the entire body of the kingdome, the which, as well the King as they had taken an oth to maintaine, but yet they could be contented that the profitable dominion of the said Dutchy and Counties should be deliuered, and come to the King of England, as his Auncestors had Aquitaine, but so yet as the regalitie of the Crowne of France should euer be reserued. The Englishmen requested that these said dominions should be absolutely, and without any condition restored to the King: answere also was made to the reason of the Frenchmen, touching the oth of their King and themselues, whereby they were bound to conserue the integritie of the honour of their kingdome, to wit, that the Pope for the benefite of peace might assoile them from the said oth, and this as to certaine articles premitted, it should be very well done: but yet nothing was done that might be of force to the furthering of the peace. And so the Embassadours without effect returned home, the Bishop of Norwich excepted, that deceased, and was buried there, to whom succeeded Thomas Percy.

The King of Nauarre through a brawle raised, slewe Charles de Spaine, Marshall of France, whereupon to auoide the displeasure and punishment of the French King, he fled into his owne Countrey, sending his vncle vnto the Duke of Lancaster with letters humbly beseeching him that he would come into Normandie to his aide and defence, and to receiue an oth of fidelitie and amitie of him against al men. The Duke therefore getting licence of the King, assembled together a great naule at Southampton, where when the Duke was ready to haue made saile, Knights that he had sent into Normandy, came backe to view the truth of this businesse, by whom it was notified to the Duke, that the said King of Nauarre his cousin was reconciled to the King, and so the Dukes voyage was staied.

Dissention at Oxford. Historia Aurea.

A great dissention fell in Oxford, betweene a Scholler and a Vintner, for a quarte of wine, so that the Scholler powred the wine on the Vintners head, and brake his head with the pot, by reason whereof, a great conflict was made betwixt the Schollers of the Vniuersitie, and the lay men of the towne, in the which, many lay men were wounded, and about twenty slaine. These troubles continued the space of two dayes, and then the religious men of the towne labouring to make peace, the lay men pursued a Scholler, & wounded him to death, yet that day the tumult was appeased, but on the morrow, the people of the villages about Oxford, being confederate with the lay men of the town came with great force, and erected a blacke banner, whereupon the Schollers fledde to their Colledges, but the Lay men breaking vp the doores, slewe many of them, and threwe them into their priuies: they cut and rent their bookes, and bare away what they liked. By this meanes the vniuersitie was dissolued, the Schollers (sauing of Merton College) went vnto their friends, and so continued more then a yéere. Many, both Schollers and Lay men were indited by the kings Iustices, amongst the which, foure Burgesses that had béen Maiors of Oxford, were sent vnto the Tower of London.

About the twentieth of November, King Edward held a Parliament at Westminster, in the which was granted towards the recouerie of his title in France, fiftie shillings of euery sacke of Woll to be transported ouer the seas for the space of fiue yéeres then next following, by meanes whereof, the King might daily dispend during the said fiue yéeres, more then one thousand marks sterling, for by the common opinion, there were more then an hundred thousand sackes of Woll yéerely into forraine lands transported, so that during those fiue yéeres, the said grant extended to 150000. pounds sterling.

Parliament at Westminster.

Rode Auesbury

After Easter, in a Parliament at Westminster, the king toke the quarrell of Oxford into his hands, and sauing euery mans right, he forgaue the schollers all the whole trespasse, so that in the summer following, the Vniuersitie began againe to flourish, and the king gaue to the Chancellour of Oxford the onely view of the assise of bread, ale, and wine, and al other victuals, excluding the Maior vtterly from that office. The communaltie of the Towne gaue to the Vniuersitie two hundred and fiftie pounds for amends, sauing vnto them neuertheleste the actions which they had vnto euery singuler person of the Towne.

Vniuersitie of Oxford restored.

Ex Record.

In this Parliament, the processe of the iudgement made against Roger Mortimer Earle of March, was reuoked, déemed erronious & false, so that the young Roger Mortimer, sonne to Edmond Mortimer, sonne and heire to Roger Mortimer, was restored to the title and possessions of the Earledome of March, as cousin and heire to his grandfather.

King Edward sayled into Fraunce.

King Edward being about Sandwich, on his iourney towards Fraunce, and the Prince of Wales at Sutton in Deuonshire, on his voyage towards Aquitaine, loking for a prosperous wind, by the space of fortie dayes or more, all things else being readie, the French King had his armies diuided in sundrie places about in the hauens of Normandie, and other parts, to impeach the landing of the king and Prince, and so long they lay there, that the Frenchmen with their hired souldiours did folily waste their owne Countrey, and consumed so many thousands of Crownes out of the French kings coffers vainely, that in the ende he being néedie, payde not his people, and so hée was forsaken of them, that when King Edward wasted Fraunce, the French King had not men to encounter him, but fledde before him, as hée followed, burning his owne Townes, and destroying victuals, tualles, that the king should find neither harborough nor meate.

After the moneth of August, the king of England, and the Duke of Lancaster, with seuen thousand armedmen, and their retinue, entred Fraunce, and by the space of nine daies iourney, as they went, wasting all by fire that came in their way, and returning to Caleis, the king heard that the Scots entred by stealth, and had taken the Towne of Barwike, the Baron of Graystocke being in the army with the king, to whom the charg of that Towne had been committed, whereupon the king hasted into Barwike, and within fiftéene daies recouered the Towne againe, being deliuered vnto him, life and liberty to depart being giuen vnto them that were found therin. Barwike taken by the Scots. Barwike taken by the Englishmen.

After this he passed through Scotland vnto the Scottish sea, but because victuals fayled for his army, the king giuing them licence, they all returned towards England. There followed on the taile of the army, by the space of twelue miles, Robert Herle, Almerike de Saint Edmond, Robert de Hildesley, and other, whom the Scots in the night season found asleepe and at rest, doubting nothing of any misaduenture, wherfore they gaue a cruell assault vpon them, with an hideous noyse and crie, where, after long resistaunce, Robert de Hildesley, and Iohn Brancester knightes were taken prisoners, Robert Herle and Almericke hauing much adoe to escape, for the two knightes perceiuing the Scots to be to strong for them, thought with themselues, that their Lords being Barons, of whom they held in fee, would redeme them, and so wyly withdrawing, deliuered them from the Scots captiuitie.

Henry Duke of Lancaster being appointed chiefe Admirall of the English Fleete, landed it at Hogges about the feast of Saint Bartholomew, and from thence rode towards Normandie, being accompanied with Philip, brother to the king of Nauarre, who desired aide of the said Duke, and requested him to come to helpe him. At this season, the French king hauing the king of Nauarre, Geffrey Harecourt, and diuers other Noble men in great suspition, touching the Realme and kingdome, bidde them all to a feast, where he toke the said king of Nauarre, and cast him in prison, and murthered the rest of the Noble men, saying, Geffrey Harecourt, whom he caused to be beheaded with an axe.

The king of Nauarre being thus imprisoned, his brother Philip seased many Castels and holds into his hands which were in Normandy and there about, strongly fortifying them with men and victuals, through the help of the Duke of Lancaster, being manned as well with Englishmen, as with the men of the same Countrey, to withstand the Frenchmen.

The same time when the king passed ouer to Caleis and France, his eldest sonne Prince of Wales, hauing with him the Earles of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisburie, and Orford, toke shipping in the beginning of October at Sutton Hauen in Deuonshire, and luckely sayled, and landed at Burdeaux, where he was honourably receiued by the Bishop and Clergy, being accompanied with all the common people in the first Sonday of that moneth: The Monday following, the Prince going out, lodged two miles from Burdeaux, in the Castell of Urnoun. On the next day, he passed through a streight wood, and so through the middle of the towne of Langon, sometimes walled, but now defaced: and so passing on a long iourney, he lost many horses, and came at length to the strong Castell of Mandzet. On Thursday he came to the Citie of Belas, hauing in it a Cathedrall Church, and a couent of friers minors. On friday proclamation was made in the army, that euery man should beare the armes of Saint George, and it was said that his enemies bare the same also. On Saterday he passed to the Castell of Nau, where stand three castles of three Lords, whereof one sheweth a farre off.

On Friday the twelfth of that moneth, his army passed the lands of Mordiur, which are belonging to the Earle of Flur; this daies iourney being long and tedious, he lost many of his horses in the wast ground called the Launds. Two miles from the towne of Aurule, hee displayed his banners, and diuided his armies into diuers troupes. In the vaward, wherein was three thousand men of armes, were the earle of Warwike high Constable, Reignold Cobham, Lord Marshall, Lord Beauchampe, a Somersetshire man, the Lord Clifford, and the Lord Thomas of Hampton, belonging to the Ancients, and with them seuen Barons of Gascoigne. In the middleward, wherein were seuen thousand men of armes, besides Clerkes and Pages, there was the Prince himselfe with a double Antient, the Earle of Oxford, the Lord Bartholomew Burgherst, the Lord Iohn de Lile, the Lord Willowby, the Lord le Ware, the Lord Maurice Barkley, sonne to Thomas Lord Barkley then liuing, very olde, the Lord Iohn Bourser, Lord Iohn Rose the elder of Burdeaux, Captaine de la Busch, the Lord Tamount, the Lord Mountferrant, with their antients. In the rereward was foure thousand men of armes, committed to the charge of the Earle of Suffolke, the Earle of Salisburie, and the Lord Nemers, who led the Bernences: In the whole army was of men of armes, Clerks, Pages, Archers, Brigants, and other, aboue 60000. men, and this day was Iohn Barefort, and diuers other made knights, and the village of Aurule, with three other villages (whereof William Lord Raymond was Captaine) were deliuered vp vnto the Prince, wherein he lodged his army, and resting there two daies, as many as would were suffered to go out, and take victuals, and burnt their enemies countrey. On Tuesday, they lodged in the towne of Mount Clere, where the Castell belonging thereunto was giuen vp to the Prince, and after he left it againe to the Frenchmen, by reason of fire which brake vp in the town, whereupon the Prince went out into the field, and lodged in his tentes, euer after refusing to lie in any towne. This day hauing taken three townes, and burning them, hee made knights Gilotus de Straton, and diuers other. Also Iohn de Lile stricken with a quarrell at Austage, died. On Wednesday and Thursday he lay still, and on Friday he came before the strong towne of Loegeron, where he lodged in his tents. On Saterday he came before Placence, a very faire town, & strong, the inhabitants whereof fled away into the Castell, where the Earle of Poleine, and many knights were taken by Captaine de la Bouch, and the Lord Mountferrant, & de Lonchis, who was that day made knight. On Sonday S. Lukes day, they laid at Ewant, and taking the fort of Galian, by force, they set it on fire, and burnt it. On Mun-day casting fire in the towne of Plasence, they passed along, leauing the towne of Beal Parch on the right hand, and lodged before the towne of the Archbishop of Anker, called Le Vaile. On this day Richard Stafford brother vnto the Earle of Stafford, led his men with his Antient towards the towne: and on the next day being Tuesday, the towne was yeelded vnto him, and because it belonged to the Church, the Prince would not suffer any man to enter into it, excepting certaine persons appointed of purpose, for the deliuering of victualles. On Wednesday they leauing the faire towne of Estamount, on the left hand, they came before the noble towne of Merand, belonging to the Earle of Comenge, which was full of armed souldiours, and the Prince lodged in the great monasterie of Bartons, in the which Abbey, there was not so much as one liuing creature found. On Thursday they lay still, doing no harme to the said Abbey. On Friday they went out of the faire and rich countrey of Arminake, and entred the countrey of Aufferike, through the which, the passage was very hard and hilly, and lodged at Saraunt a towne, they set it on fire, contrary to the commaundement of the prince.

All that day, and three daies following, they passed alongst by the high hils of Aragon. On Saterday, they came to the towne of Saint Poze, where the rereward of the army lodged in a great monasterie of blacke monkes, which were all fled away: the middle ward at Villfrankes, and the vaward at Cremaine: these villages being very rich, and full of victualles, had no man in them, for all the inhabitants were fled.

Sunday the foure and twentieth of October, they passed a certaine wood, and entred into the lands of the Earle of Comenge, which reached vnto Tolouse, but these countries were wasted with fire and sword, and leauing on the left hand the towne called Sannetere in Aufferike, the passed by the strong Citie of Winbers, where Pope Iohn the two and twentieth remouing the blacke monkes, erected a Bishops sea, and they were lodged in a great & rich towne called Sotanco, belonging to the Earledome of Commenge, where was a couent of friers minors: and burning this towne on Monday they passed through a goodly wide countrey, very plaine, and so came to the towns of Saint Foy, and Saint Litz. On Tuesday they rested: and on Wednesday being the feast of Simon and Iude, the army passed through the riuer of Geround, being a water very fierce, stony and terrible: and againe the same day, through the riuer of Arage, much more dangerous, and came vnto Tolouse: before that time, neuer durst any horseman passe ouer these waters, wherefore the people of this countrey being wonderfully made afraid, could not tell what to doe, for being sodainly taken, they could not flee: that night, the prince lodged at Falgard, a little towne, one mile from Tolouse. On Tuesday they came vnto the faire and great town called Mount Giskard, being part of the inheritance of the Lord Almerike de la Fossad, the which town the French king had taken from him, because he was the king of Englandes fedeman. Fast by the said towne were twelue Windmilles, the which they set on fire all at once. There were taken two espies, they certified the Prince that the Earle of Armeniake was at Tolouse, and the Connestable of Fraunce at Mount Paban, foure leagues from Tolouſe. On Friday they paſſed on towards Auinion, by the good towne of Baſige, and the Towne called Franke, and the whole armie lodged at the great Towne called Auionet, and the middle ward and rereward lay in one ſide of the Suburbes, and the vaward lay on the other ſide of the Towne, which the townesmen perceiuing, fled euerie one.

There were about this town twentie Windmils, which they ſet on fire. On Saterday the laſt of October, they lodged in the great Towne called Claſtalnanner, where a Church of the Chanons, a couent of Friers Preachers, and another of Carmelites, with an Hoſpitall, and a village called Les mauns de Pucels, with a couent of Friers Auguſtines, were all conſumed with fire. On Sunday, the feaſt of Allſaints, the army reſted, out of the which armie, certaine going to take boties, they toke a little Towne, the inhabitants wherof to be ſpared from ſpoyling, gaue them ten thouſand florens of gold. On Monday they marched along by the townes of S. Mathele Port, and the great Town called Milkapinch, and from thence, they entred the Countrey of Carkaſon, & the Prince lodged at a little village called Alſe. On Tueſday they came to Carkaſon, a faire Towne, rich & well built, bigger then London. Within the wals, betwirt the towne of Sanburge, and the City being double walled, there ran a goodly water, which paſſed vnder a faire ſtone bridge, at the foote wherof, were foure couents of religious, of the which, the Friers ran not away, but the other fled into the Citie. The whole armie was lodged in the Towne, which abounded with Muſkadel, and all other delicate victualles. This day, the ſonnes of the Lord Libret, and Walter Baſſet, with Rowland Daues, and many other, were made knights.

Carkaſon in France brent.

On Wedneſday and Thurſday, the armie lying ſtill in the Towne, and hauing made a truce, they parled with them of the Citie concerning a peace, the Citizens offering for ſauing the Towne from burning two hundred and fiftie thouſand of golden Souſes: the Prince anſwered, he came not for gold, but to take Cities and Townes, together with their inhabitants, and the next day commaunded the Towne to be brent.

On Friday, the Towne being brent, the armie departed, leauing on the left hand the Caſtell of Botenake vntouched, paſſing through the champaine Countrey, burning Townes called la Ruſtican, and all the countrey thereabout.

On Saterday they trauelled through a great wind and duſt, leauing on the left hand a great pole of freſh water, being in compaſſe about xxx. leagues, and is called Caſibon. They came to a Towne called Silony, which was yelded to the Prince, and therefore neuer touched: and the Prince was lodged that night at a good towne called Canet. On Sonday the eight day of Nouember, they paſſed the water of Sandey, partly at the ford called Chaſtell de Terre, and partly ouer a bridge, and ſo trauelled betwirt high hilles, vnto the great Citie of Narbon, whereof that Countrey taking his name is called Gallia Narbonenſis. The Citie was verie ſtrong, and well walled, hauing in it a great Cathedrall Church: alſo a notable Caſtle, belonging to the Bishop, a verie strong Tower for the Earle of the same Towne. It had also a Suburbe called a Borough, much bigger, and better built, then the Borough of Carkason.

Biſhop

In the Borough were foure Couents of religious persons. Betwixt the Borough and the Citie, there runneth a water called Ande, comming from Carcason, and runneth into the Grekish sea. Betwixt the Citie and the Borough are two bridges of stone, and the third of timber, built with storehouses for diuers Merchandises. The prince was lodged in the house of Carmelite friars. On Tuesday the Borough being set on fire, the armie passing to the waters side, went ouer it in diuers places. From thence, they went and lodged at the Towne and Castell of Ambion. On Wednesday they trauelled an euill iourney, and hurtfull to the horse for lacke of water. On Thursday Theodorike Dale, Porter of the Princes chamber, was made Knight: thence the armie passed by a good Town called Ulmes: the middleward passed vnto the good Towne of the Earle of Lile, called Arnile, where they lodged that night. The Prince lay at the Friers Minors, where was great abundance of Muskadell, being prouided for the Countesse of the Ile, which was all spoyled. This day also, the good Towne of Pipions was destroyed, with the Castle therof called Redote. On Friday, the army passing by a long stonie way, lodged at Lamian. On Saterday, returning backe toward Gascoigne, they left on their right hand the great pole of Esbone, and Carkason, and all the iourney that they went before, and the rereward lodged at a good Towne called Apier, and the middleward at Puchfancies, where a Castle being defended, withstood them a season, but at the length was woon, and the Prince lay beyond the Bridge, by a fayre running water, on both sides wherof, the Countrey was spoyled with fire, together with the good Towne of Pelaunce where the vaward was lodged that night. On Sunday they trauelled a long iourney, because the Prince should be lodged in the great Abbey of our Lady de Prolion, where in seuerall Cloysters did line 100. Predicants, wherunto, the Prince was deuoutly receiued. In the day, the armie set on fire the Towne of Lemins, where there was farre greater Couents of Religious, then at Carcason. Also, they burnt the faire Towne called Falanges, vnto which Towne belonged one and twentie Windmilles. They burnt also the Townes of Vnlard, and Serre, with all the whole Countrey lying thereabouts. On Munday the middleward lodged at the good Towne called Dealpubbon, which long time was defended, but at length gotten by force, the Castell wherof yelded, vnto the which Towne and Castell, the Prince commaunded, that no harme should be done by fire. On Tuesday earely passing ouer the riuer of Beseile, they entred into a countrey which was broad. About one a clocke, they came before a great Abbey called Bourghbon, where the Earle of Flurens with great ioy receiued the Prince, he being newly escaped out of prison from Paris, where he had laine by the space of two yéers: and the said earle remained from that time faithfull to the Prince. This day they rode in the Lordships and seigniories of the same Earle, by the towns of Pasel and Colmon, and on the right hand they passed by the great towne of Saint Canole, and the high Castell called Hautripe: but on this day they brent nothing for reuerence of the foresaid Earle & his vineyards, but passed againe ouer the water of Arage, leauing also Tolouse as they did at the first, but then one mile on the left hand, and now foure leagues on the right, and the middle ward was lodged in the great towne of Mermount, which together with the Castell was brent. On Wednesday, they passed by the Castell of the Earle of Flure called Mounthane, at the foote whereof, all the horsemen passed ouer the great water Gerround, & there toke the towne and castell of North, then leauing the riuer of Gerond on the left hand, and so passed vnto the towne of Marconaw, which they toke: then they returned ouer the riuer againe, & toke the strong town of Carbone. On Thursday the army rested. On Friday word was brought to the Prince that the French were vp, and had gathered a great force, which they had deuided into fiue great battels, being in the field not farre from them, whereupon our men set themselues in battel aray, about one mile from the place where they lodged, and being now ready to fight, some one of the souldiers by chance start a Hare, whereupon a great shout was made, which the enemies hearing, they sent out fourty light horsemen, to see what was the cause thereof, who drawing nigh to the English army, and perceiuing them to bee set in battell aray, returned backe againe, and declared what they had seene: whereupon presently the whole army of Frenchmen fled with great feare. The same day Bartholomew Burwash, John Chandos, and Iames de Audley, with 24. light horsemen, were appointed scoutes, and comming to the taile of the Frenchmen, they toke prisoners 32. Knights and Gentlemen, amongst whom they toke the Earle of Romeme, also they slue many Carters, and Wagoners. The Prince lodged in the town of Puwose. On Saterday they marched to the Castle of Mirady, in which Castle the Prince lodged, and in the morning they burnt it. On Sonday the two and twentieth of November, about euening, they perceiued that their enemies were on the other side of the great Hill hard by the great town of Gemount, so that the Englishmen being benighted, sent out 12. light horsemen, and certaine bowmen vnto the right hand of the towne called Auremount, where finding 400. men of armes of the Constable of Fraunce, they chased them out of the town, and slew and toke many: the middle Ward lodged at Auremount, and the Vaward at Colimont. Early in the morning the Wagoners being commanded to remaine in the towne of Auremount, all the residue being diuided into troupes, went into the field, wayting for the comming of their enemies, all in vaine: for the prince taking the towne of Gamount, was told that his enemies fled away at midnight. On Tuesday the army lodged in the field, and for lacke of water, their horse were faine to drinke wine, wherupon it came to passe, that the next day their horses were so drunke they could not go right forth, and many of them died. On Saint Katherines day, with much adoe they came to water, and leauing the towne of Florence on their right hand, they passed to the great towne called Sllard, and the middle ward was lodged at a towne called Realmount, which they toke by maine force, & therefore brent it. On Thursday they rested. On Friday they trauailed a long iourney, by walled townes and strong castles, the middle ward lodged at Verde. On Saterday they passed ouer a certaine Water with great difficultie, and through woods, till they came to a good towne called Pesin. On Sunday the prince rested, and toke homage and oathes of the townesmen. On Munday S. Andrewes day trauelling a long iourney, they came to the town of Tolouse, where were three Castles. On Tuesday the prince trauelled to the castle of Pelan, where he lodged. On Wednesday the prince came to Regla, where his horses and Wagons passed through the riuer of Gerond. In this towne of Regla, the prince appointed diuers Barons and such like to winter in diuers places of the Marches, to the intent they should keepe the inland parts of Gascoigne against the Frenchmen. An. reg. 30.

Thursday

The prince of Wales touching these matters aforesaid, and for other considerations also, caused a new coyne of gold to be made in Gascoigne, being 1356.
willed himselfe about the repairing of such things as were decaied & throwen downe. And in this season, there sprang vp a foolish fantasie in the Frenchmens heads, that the K. of England was come into Normandy, the cause of which rumour rose vp, for that the Duke of Lancaster, after that he had fortified the strong places belonging to the K. of Nauarre, which were in the Ile of Constance & other places, did direct his iourney towards Britaine, whereof he was newly made chiefe captaine. Another cause was this, Philip brother to the king of Nauarre, came into England, and earnestly craued aid of the king against the French king, who kept his brother in prison, that hee might by force of armes recouer all such lands vnto him as were wrongfully withholden from him, whereupon hee offering to do homage and fealtie, had (of the kings appointment) Miles Stapleton a man of great integritie, and in martiall affaires verie skilfull, him (I say) the king appointed to bee his faithfull fellow. These men with two thousand men wel appointed traueling through Normandy, toke townes & fortresses, burning diuers of them, passing along till they came to a castle nine leagues distant from the Citie of Paris: neither did they allake their trauell, vntill they had forced their enemies to enter into a yerely truce. By this meanes a great report and no lesse feare filled the hearts of the Frenchmen, which reporte at length came to the eares of the Prince lying at Regla, wherefore he gathering all the power hee had with him in his Dukedome, to the intent to méete his Father, which hee must doe by trauelling through Fraunce, hee came at length to Burgetat, where hee was certified that the Earle of Armenia, would after his departure haue spoyled the Countrey, and for that intent had prouided a great band of men: wherefore hee sent backe to the Gouernour of Gascoigne vnto Barnard de Libret, and other. From thence the prince went into France through the coastes of Barny and Limon, still encouraging his men against their enemies, sending before him John Chandos, Iames Dawdeley, and other complices, to trie out the state of their enemies Countrey, least perhaps some crafty ambushmét might sodainly assault our men, afore they were aware. He himselfe remouing his campe euery day, and now being entred into Pictauia, his espies brought word that the French king had gathered a great armie, being now in Aurelian, who also knew of the princes comming, for he sent out espies to discouer our armie, amongst whom Griffin Micco of Chambly, petie captaine of two hundred men, meeting with other espies, came to his coast: for our espies toke thirty of them, and slue the residue, so that there was not one of them left to cary word what was become of their fellowes. Our espies proceeded towards Romerentine, where meeting with the Lord Crone, and Lord Brisgand, they set vpon them and slue them, their chiefe Captains being forced to flee to a Castle, and hauing taken their lodging in a Towne, the prince commaunded that on the morning a great assault should be giuen to them of the Castle.

The day following our men being all armed, passed through the ditches, and came vnto the wals of the Castle, some applied to scale the wal with ladders, some burne the gates, and entring, slue a great many of the chiefe men, but the Lords before named fled vnto the principall tower of the castle: but the prince determined not to depart, till they that were besieged, were either taken or yelded: at length the Castle bridg vndermined, the men besieged, with all humility yelded vp the Castle. After this the spies declared that the French king was come down to Turon, to prouide armies to go against the Prince, of the which tidings the Prince being glad, he pight his tentes against the French king, but could not passe the riuer of Leger, by reason of great floods, and the French king had broken all the Bridges, to the intent there should be no passage betwixt the Prince & the Duke of Lancaster, whose armies might well euery night perceiue each others fires in the Campes: but the Prince following alongst the riuer of Legers Eastward, he pight his tents neere vnto Turon, where loking for the French king foure daies, hoping to fight with him, for that he was distant but one league off, he vnderstood that the French king was retyred backe to Blaunis, ten leagues off: passing ouer by a Bridge the Riuer of Legers at a place vsed betwixt two strong Townes, and so toward Poyters. This returning of the French king certified the prince returned backe, intending to haue met him in the way, which he could not doe: yet crossing ouer all, as he imagined the nerer way, he set vpon the taile of his enemies, and cut from them the Earles of Inynt and Winters, and also the marshal of Burgony, these being taken, died, as was thought, through the great toyle they had taken: night drawing on, our men gaue themselues to rest in a wood, intending the next day to take their iourney toward Poyters, and by the way they were certified that the French king, with great prouision prepared himselfe to battell, and drew nigh to our tents: the prince therfore committed the vaward of the armie to the Earles of Warwicke and Oxford, the middle ward was guided by the Prince, and the rereward was led by the Earles of Salisburie and Suffolke. In all the whole armie of the Prince there was not aboue foure thousand men of armes, one thousand armed souldiours, and two thousand Archers. The pompous nobility of the Frenchmen drew nigh, greatly disdaining the small company of the English men, for they had in number eight thousand fighting souldiours, they had also

seuen Antients. At this matter a great many of our men murmured, because of late a great part of our army was sent to defend Gascoigne. There was among the Frenchmen a certaine Scot called William Douglas, a man of great force and practise in the warres: this man did the French King make knight, and because he knew he would be a deadly enemie to the Englishmen, he gladly hearkned to his aduices. This William was captaine ouer two hundred Scots: these men vnderstood well that it was the custome of the English men in those dayes to fight on foote, in which point they followed the Scots, and the Scot also prouoked the French King and other French men to fight in like manner. The French King obeying his foolish counsell, gladly agreed vnto his sayings, whereupon he sent light horsemen into the Citie, that they should suffer no man to make any chase, but onely 500. horsemen wel appointed to come out against the archers, in the beginning of the conflict, and to run them ouer and to tread them vnder their horse feete: but these performed not that which was commaunded them as it appeared by the sequele thereof. The armies being set in a readinesse on both sides for to fight earely on Sonday in the morning which was notable sayre, behold there came the Cardinall of Petragorcen, and charged the Prince, in the name of God who was crucified, that it might please him to deferre the warre for a time, both for ecclesiasticall peace, and also for the sparing of Christian blood, and to the end there might be a treatie had of peace, the which he promised should be performed with great honour on both sides. The Prince neither feared nor refused peace but modestly agreed to the request of this Father. All this day now being appointed for the obtaining of peace, the armie of the Frenchmen encreased by the number of a thousand men of armes, and also of other. On the morrowe after, the Cardinall came againe from the French King, in his behalfe to request a truce, which should endure for one whole yeere, the which the Prince denyed, yet at the importunate sute of that Cardinall, he graunted a truce to continue till Christmas next comming. Therefore the Cardinall returning to the French King, requested him of pledges for the truce, but the Marshall Dawdenam, Geffrey de Charney and Douglas the Scot, perswaded him that by common reason it could not come to passe that the Englishmen should at that time preuaile, and especially, because they were but fewe, and in a strange countrey, and wearied out miserably with their toyle in trauell, and therefore not able to indure so great a nũber of the Frenchmen of France, who stood in defence of their owne land. The Prince of Wales being certified, that the captaines of the French, would haue no kind of peace, but such as they could get by force of armes, and calling his men together, he made to them an Oration first in general, and then to his Archers as followeth: your manhood (saith he) hath bin alwaies knowen to me, in great dangers, which sheweth that you are not degenerate from true sonnes of English men, but to be descended from the blood of them which heretofore were vnder my fathers Dukedome, and his predecessors Kings of England, vnto whõ no labor was painefull, no place inuincible, no ground vnpassable, no hill (were it neuer so high) inaccessible, no tower vnscaleable, no army impenetrable, no armed souldiour, or whole hosts

of men was formidable. Their liuely couragiousnesse tamed the Frenchmen, the Cipzians, the Syracusians, the Calabzians, & the Palestines, and brought vnder the stiffe necked Scots, & vnruly Irishmen, yea, and the Welchmen also, which could well endure all labor. Occasion, time, and dangers, maketh of fearefull, very strong an stoute, & doth many times of dull witted men make wittie: honour also, and loue of the Countrey, and the desire of the rich spoyle of the Frenchmen, doth stirre you vp to follow your fathers steps. Wherefore followe your Antientes, and wholy be intentiue to follow the commandement of your Captaines as well in minde as in body, that if victorie come with life, we may still continue in firme frendship together, hauing alwayes one will, and one minde: but if enuious Fortune (which God forbid) should let vs at this present, to runne the race of all flesh, and that we ende both life and labour together, be you sure that your names shall not want eternall fame and heauenly ioy, and we also with these gentlemen our companions, will drinke of the same cuppe that you shall doe, vnto whom it shall be an eternall glory and name, to haue wonne the nobilitie of France: but to be ouercome (as God forbid) is not to be ascribed vnto the danger of time, but to the courage of the men. Hauing spoken these words, he perceiued that there was a hill hard by which was planted on the top with hedges and ditches, the inside whereof was very plaine, and a pasture fielde on the one side thereof, with many rough bushes, and on the other side it was all planted with vines, and the residue was plaine, in the top whereof he did imagine the armie of the French to lye betwixt our men and the Hill. There were great and lowe valleys, and a piece of Marish ground. One company of the Prince finding out a narrowe passage, entred the valley and toke the hill, where among the bushes they hid themselues, taking the aduantage of the place. The fielde wherein our men lay, to witte, the vawarde and middlewarde, was deuided from the plaine where the French armie lay, with a long hedge and ditch, the one end whereof did reach down to the Marish aforesaid: that of the Hill next the Marish, the Earle of Warwicke kept, Captaine of the vawarde. In the vpper part of the hedge, toward the hanging of the hill, there was a great gap, from the which a stones cast stode our rereward, ouer the which the Earle of Salisbury was Captaine. Our enemies perceyuing our Princes Antient to be displayed, and ofttimes to be remoued from place to place, and by reason of the Hill to be sometime quite out of sight, they iudged that the Prince fled; yet Douglas the Scot and Marshall de Clarimount, said that it was not so, but Marshall Dawdenam being deceiued in his owne opinion, thought otherwise, crying out still to follow & chase the Prince now fleeing, and with him also Douglas, to the intent to gette preferment and a worthie name of his new warfare: But Clarimount to wash away the euill opinion which was conceiued of him touching his fidelitie, was the more vehement to perswade them forward, for vnto them the charge of the vaward was deputed: before these went out, the fashion was, certaine to chase and to sucke, against whom certaine that were vnder the Hill of our vaward came to méete Marshall Dawdenam, who staying to sée the ende of the sucking, kept himselfe from encountring. In the meane time Clarimount thinking to come out by the gap in the hedge, and so to come at the backe of our vawarde, and to compasse them in, met with the Earle of Salisburie, who perceiuing his comming and purpose, suspected his whole intent, and so they which gouerned our rereward, making hast to take the gap, and kepe the enemie from passing that way sustained the first charge of the battell. Then began a terrible meeting betwixt the armed men, who laid on load with swordes and speares, neither did the Archers slacke their dutie, but lying in safe trenches, start vp aboue the ditche and shot ouer the hedge, preuailing more with their arrowes then they did that fought in armes: thus our rereward slaying the enemies, who came straggling to the gap, and the vaward which lay on the hanging of the hill toward the Parish being gouerned by the Earle of Warwike, were alwayes readie and met with the Frenchmen, beating them downe. The Archers of the vawarde were placed in the Parish, out of daunger from the horse-men, yet for all that they did preuaile there somewhat, for the horsemen were appointed to no other purpose, but to ouerrunne the Archers. The Earle of Oxford considering the discommoditie that might ensue thereof, departed from the Princes warde, and leading with him the Archers, set them on the one side of the Frenchmen, commaunding them to shoote at the hinder parts of the horses, by meanes whereof the horses being gauld and wounded, fell to tumbling with them that sate on their backes, or els turned backe & ran vpon them that followed after, making great slaughter vpon their owne masters. The horsemen being thus beaten backe, the Archers retired towards the place from whence they came, shooting & gawling the sides of the French men which fought right ouer against them: by this time the force and heate of the battell began to be in prime, when as the Earles of Warwike & Salisbury, like fierce Lions, endeuoured of purpose which of them should dung the land of Poyters most with Frenchmens blood. Neither was the wise Counseller Thomas Dassord of Suffolke idle at that season, who right worthily in all his acts behaued himselfe, being expert and skilfull in actiuitie. For he continually running from warde to warde, and into all troupes and companies, comforted and stirred them vp with good words to doe well, hauing a great regard that the youthfull sort of lustie souldiers being too bolde vpon their good hearts and courage, should not without regard goe out too farre, and placed the Archers at sundry times to great aduantages, and oftentimes as leysure would suffer him, he would encourage vp the minds of the souldiers. Clarimount was slaine, William Douglas also being wounded fled, hauing with him a fewe Scottes of his bande, with Archebald Douglas his brother: our men retyring, put themselues in good aray, and our vawarde and middle warde ioyned themselues together, by and by there marcheth forth a newe armie of the Frenchmen, the which the eldest sonne of the French King Dolphin of Vienna, brought forth. The order and aray of this armie was more terrible & fierce then the shew of that which was last oppressed, yet for al that could it not make our men afraid, who were sharpe set, and very desirous of honour, and also of reuenge, both for themselues, and their fellowes, which a little before were slaine and wounded. And therefore boldely they goe to it on both sides, making showtes and noyses, crying out, Saint George to borow, or Saint Denis be for vs. Within a while they were come to fight man to man, and euery man ready to die fight now to saue their liues, neither doth the Lion make the wolfe more afraid, or ỹ Tiger is more terrible to the simple beast, then our lusty gentlemen were to their enemies, who chased them, and slue them like as the wolues chase and kill sheepe. And though that this battel withstood our men more then the first, yet, after they had lost a great many of their men, they had such a deuise, that they saued many, & yet, not by running away, but by a faire retreate, which the Frenchmen are accustomed to vse. But our men considering, that the victorie of the fielde was doubtfull, as long as the French King might be in presence with his armie, who lay there halfe hid in a Valley, they would not afterward, when they had chased any that fled, goe out of the fielde, but the worthie man Maurice Barkeley, sonne of Thomas Barkley, had no regard thereunto, who for the space of two houres together with his men, neuer spared, but would be still in the forefront of the battell, inuading his enemies with the first. This Maurice being in the middest of the Dolphins gard sowed blowes among them, first with a speare, then with a sword, and at length being all alone compassed with the multitude, and sorely wounded, he was taken prisoner. In the meane time our men caried those which were wounded of their campe, and laid them vnder bushes and hedges out of the way, other hauing spent their weapons toke the speares & swordes from them whom they had ouercome: and the archers lacking arrowes, made hast to drawe them from poore wretches that were but halfe dead: there was not one of them al, but either he was wounded or quite wearied with great labour, except 400. mẽ who kéeping the chiefe standert, were appointed to méete the French K. The Dophin being thus put to flight, one came to the French K. and said, my Lord K. the field is fallen to the Englishmen, and your eldest son hath withdrawn himselfe: vnto whom the French K. answered with an oth, that he would not that day forsake ỹ field vnlesse he were taken or slaine, and so by that meanes caried away by force: wherefore the antient-bearers are commanded to march forwards, after whom followed two great companies of armed men into a wide field, shewing themselues to our men, & stroke a great feare into their heartes, in so much that they were out of hope to conquer any more. The which thing a man of great wisdom standing by ỹ Prince signified with a howling voice, (saying alas we poore wretches are ouercome,) but the prince hauing a great trust & faith in Christ, checked him saying, thou liest thou dastardly fellow, for thou canst not say that we can be ouercome as long as I liue. Captaine de la Buche, a noble man in all affaires as soone as he perceiued the armies of the French King, marching forth of their tentes, asking licence of the prince departed away with lx. souldiors, & a hundred Archers, whom many of our men thought to haue fled away, therefore our souldiors (excepting the chiefe Captaines) being quite out of hope of victory, committed themselues wholy to the mercy of God. Then the Prince commanded his Antient bearer Sir Walter Woodland, to march forward toward his enemies, mies, and with a fewe freſh men he ioyned battell with the great armie of the French king: by and by they ſounde their trumpets, one giuing anſwere to another, they made ſuch a noyſe, that the walles of Poyters ſounded with the Eccho thereof like a wood, in ſuch ſort that a man would haue thought that the hils had bellowed out to the valleis, and that the cloudes had giuen forth a moſt terrible thunder, to the which there wanted no cruel lightnings, whileſt the aire ſhone on the bright armour & ſpeares daſhing againſt ſhining harneis. Then came on the cruell company of croſſbowmen making a darknes in the ſkies with the multitud of quarrels which they ſhot, againſt whom came a worthy company of Engliſh bowmen: out flies alſo darts of Aſh which met with the enemie a far off: but the French army being ful of diuers troupes and many armed men defending their breſts with their ſhields, proceed forward againſt their enemies: wherefore our Archers hauing emptied their quiuers in vaine, being armed onely with ſwordes and targets, are faine to encounter with them that were laden with armour. Then beſtirreth himſelf the worthy Prince of Wales, cutting and hewing the Frenchmen with a ſharpe ſword. In the meane time Captaine de la Buche marcheth a compaſſe about, vnder the hanging of the hill, which he with the Prince a little before forſooke, and priuily compaſſing about the fielde, at the length commeth cloſe vnder the place where the French Campe lay, from thence he aſcended to the toppe of the Hill that way, which the Frenchmen had beaten with their trauaile, and ſo ſodainly breaking forth vnlooked for, and ſhewing by the enſigne of Saint George that he was our friend, the Prince with great courage giueth a freſh charge on the French armie, being deſirous to breake their rankes, before the Captaine aforeſayde, ſhould ſet on the ſide of the battayle. The Prince luſtily encountring with his enemies goeth into the middle of the throng, and where hee ſeeth moſt company, there hee layeth about him on euery ſide.

In the meane time on euery ſide, his friendes which ſerued with Captaine de la Buche, were at the backes of the enemies, beating downe and killing without pitie, and the Archers alſo placed for the purpoſe ſhot ſo thicke, wounding the backes and ſides of the Frenchmen, in ſuch ſort, that the fourme of the battaile was quite ſpoyled, neither could they put themſelues in order or aray any more. This was the courage of the Prince who at the length thruſteth thorow the throngs of them that guarded the French king, then ſhould you ſée an Antient beginne to nod and ſtumble, the bearers of them to fall downe, the blood of ſlaues and Princes ran mingled together into the waters which were nigh. In like ſorte the Boye of Cornewall rageth, who ſéeketh to haue none other way to the French kings ſtandard, then by blood onely: but when they came there, they met with a company of ſtoute men to withſtand them, the Engliſhmen fight, the Frenchmen alſo lay on, but at length Fortune making haſte to turne her wheele, the Prince preaſeth forward on his enemies, and like a fierce Lion beating downe the proud, he came to the yéelding vp of the French king. The Frenchmen being ſcattered abroad in the fieldes of Poyters perceyuing that the ſtandard with the Lowzedeluce was beaten downe, fled with all spéede towards the Towne, which was not farre off: the English men perceyuing them to be fléeing, though themselues were either sore wounded or wearied, followed them in chase euen to the gates of Poyters, where in a great skirmish and very daungerous, they slew a great number of Frenchmen. At the last our men being called backe by retreate with the sound of trumpet, and assembling togither, there were diuerse pauilions and tents set vp in the fields, and the whole company being throughly comforted with this victorie, gaue their whole endeuour to prouide for them that were wounded, for the quiet rest of them that were wearied, for safe kéeping of them that were taken prisoners, and for the refreshing of the that were almost famished, vntil they had ful vnderstanding who and how many were wanting: Among them which were found halfe dead, was found the Lord Iames Dawdley, by reason of his broad buckler, and being caried in the armes of his souldiors, was brought to the Princes lodging, and the Prince himselfe rose from his supper, and came to him, and caused him to be stripped and laid in a soft bed, and being somewhat better com to his remembraunce, the Prince comforted him, swearing to him that he had the French King yélded vnto him, which newes when the languishing Noble man heard, he straightwayes reuiued. The Prince returning to the French King, willed him not to denie that to be a worthie déede of his that rose from his supper to comfort him that was almost dead, who spared not his owne blood to purchase victorie. After that they hauing had some talke concerning the warres which Iames Dawdeley made, the French King said that amongst all other stoute Champions which valiantly that day behaued themselues, he did greatly wonder at the noble déedes of that Knight, and he spake not much more in all his supper, but what he spake to the Prince, who comforted his noble pray. Such like words, it is said that the French King spake: Although it be our chance to fall into an euerlasting sorow, yet for all that we thought it good to refraine from the same by a kind of measure, for though we be vnder subiection by law and right of warre vnder our noble cousin, yet are we not as rascals, or faint hearted runne awayes, or taken lying hid close in a corner, but after the manner of the fielde by the ende and successe of warre, where we were as ready to dye as liue for iustice sake. And in the same field were many rich men taken, whose liues were reserued for ransome, the faint hearted and lewd chased away, but the worthiest and stoutest were spoyled of their liues. This battell of Poytiers was fought on the nineteenth day of September.

The nert day after the battell, all the prisoners were numbred, to wit, the French King, also Phillip his sonne, the Archbishop of Senon, the Earle of Pontue, the Earle of Longuile, the Earle of Ewe, the Earle of Tankeruile, the Earle Daunter, the Earle of Vendadour, the Earle of Slauncer, the earle of Wademount, the Earle of Vandome, the Earle of Juyny, the Earle Don Martin, the Earle of Selabrase, the Earle of Sallo, Vicount Nerbon, the Lord Daubeny, Marshall Dawdenam, the Lord Guinchard de Angle, Seneshal de Scintong, the Lord Mores Pawnimet, the Lord Leonard de Guil-hoy, the Senechal of Poyters, the Lord great Maister, the chiefe Maister of the hospitall of Spaigne, the Lord of S. Migre, the Lord Damboyd Senechall of Annar, the Lord Lower, the Lord Wars, the Lord Duruall, the Lord of the towne of Ernel, the Lord Maugeler, the Lord Planke, the Vicount de Belimount, and the Lord of Sulz: there were also the bodies founde of many that were slaine, as the Duke of Burbon, the Duke Dasines, the Constable of France, Marshall de Gartmount, the Lord Geffrey de Charney, the Lord Pounce, the Bishop of Chaloner, the Lord of Laundas, the Lord Ripemount, the Lord Chaneny, the Lord Jocle, the Lord Nele, the Lord Aunger, the Lord de Mount John, the Lord Margenton, the Lord Ezwse, the Lord Ruas, the Lord Rochechicheward, the Lord de Vilem. The Prince bought all the prisoners and captiues of them that kept them, and carried them with him to Burdeaux, there to remaine in safe custodie, during his abode there. An. reg. 31. 1357.

Edward Prince of Wales returning into England with Iohn the French King, Philip his sonne, and many other prisoners, arriued at Plimouth on the fift of May, and the foure and twentieth of May entred London with them, where he was receiued with great honour of the Citizens, and so conueyed to the Kings pallace at Westminster, where the King sitting in his estate in Westminster hall, receiued them, and after conueyed the French King to a lodging, where he lay a season: and after the said French King was lodged in the Sauoy, (which then was a pleasant place belonging to the Duke of Lancaster.) In the winter following were great and royall Iusts holden in Smithfield at London, where many knightly fights of armes were don, to the great honour of the King and Realme, at the which were present, the Kings of England, France, and Scotland, with many noble estates of all those kingdomes, whereof the more part of the strangers were prisoners.

Henry Picard Vintner, Maior of London, in one day did sumptuously feast Edward King of England, Iohn King of France, the King of Cipres (then arriued in England) Dauid King of Scots, Edward Prince of Wales, with many noble men and other, and after the said Henry Picard kept his hal against all commers whosoeuer, that were willing to play at dice and hazard. In like manner the Lady Margaret his wife did also kepe her Chamber, to the same intent. The King of Cipres playing with Henry Picard in his hall, did winne of him fifty marks, but Henry being very skilful in that arte, altering his hand did after win of the same King, the same fiftie markes, and fiftie markes more, which whē the same king began to take in ill part, although he dissembled the same, Henry said vnto him, My Lord & king be not agreeued, I couet not your gold but your play, for I haue not bid you hither that I might greeue you, but that amongst other things I might trie your play, and gaue him his money again, plentifully bestowing of his own amongst the retinue: besides, he gaue many rich gifts to the King and other nobles and Knights, which dined with him, to the great glorie of the Citizens of London in those dayes.

Amurath 3. K. of y^e Turke

The French King vnder colour of peace, offered to King Edward Flaunders, Picardy, Aquitaine, and other lands, which the Engliſhmen had ranged through and ſpoyled, for the performance whereof, meſſengers were ſent into France, but the Frenchmen would not performe the offer, wherefore King Edward being angry with a nauie of ſhips paſſed the ſea to Caleis, where diuiding his army into thrée parts he committed one company to Henry Duke of Lancaſter, another to Prince Edward, and the third he reſerued to himſelfe, and ſo paſſed into Burgundy.

King Edward inuaded Burgundie.

In the Lent ſeaſon, the Normans with a ſmall nauy arriued at Winchelſey, and partly brent the towne, and ſlew ſuch as did withſtand them: wherefore the Prelates of England aſſembled from all parts in armour to withſtand ſtand them, but when they had prepared themſelues to battell, the French were gone, leauing behind them two of their ſhips, which ſtucke faſt in the land, and 200. of their men.

King Edward with his power rode through France, by Picardy, Artois, Roan, Champaine, & ſo to Britaine, deſtroying the countrey before him. And here is to be noted, that the 14. day of Aprill, and the morrow after Eaſter day, king Edward with his hoſt lay before the Citie of Paris, which day was full darke of miſt and haile, and ſo bitter cold, that many men died on their horſe backes with the cold, wherefore vnto this day it hath béene called the Blacke Monday. The king of Nauarre vexed ſore the marches of Normandy. Thus was the realme of France miſerably beſet on all ſides. At the laſt, a final peace was concluded on this condition, that king Edward ſhould haue to his poſſeſſion, the countries of Galcoigne, Guyen, Poytiers, Limoſin, Baleuile, Xantes, Caleis, Guiſnes, and diuers other Lordſhips, Caſtles, Townes, and all the landes to them belonging, without knowledge of any ſoueraignetie or ſubiection for the ſame. This peace béing confirmed by writing and by oath, king Edward came into England, and ſo ſtraight to the tower to ſée the French king, where he appointed his ranſome to be three millions of Florences, and ſo deliuered him of all impriſonment, and brought him with great honour to the Sea, who then ſailed ouer into France.

There was then a prieſt in England, called William Wicham, who was ſo great with the king that all things were done by him, & without him nothing was done. And ſo when the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter was void, the king of England at the deſire of the ſaid prieſt, wrote to the Duke of Burbon, that he would for his ſake, make ſuch ſute to Pope Vrban, that his chaplein might haue the biſhoprick of Wincheſt. promiſing the Duke in his doings, to intreat him right courteouſly for his impriſonment & hoſtage. When the duke of Burbon ſaw the K. of Englands meſſengers & his letter, he was therof right ioyous: and ſhewed all the manner to the French king, who counſelled him to go to the Pope for the ſame, & ſo he did, for he went to Auignon to the Pope, who was not as thē gone to Rome, & ſo the duke made his requeſt to the Pope, and he granted him, & gaue him the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter at his pleaſure, ſo that the king of England would be fauourable to him in the compoſition for his deliuerance, that the foreſaid William Wicham ſhould haue the ſaid Biſhoprick. Then the duke of Burbon returned into France, & ſo into England, and there treated with the king & his counſel for his deliuerāce, or he would ſhew his buls from the Pope. The king of England loued ſo well this prieſt, that the Duke of Burbon was deliuered quite, and paid 20000. Frankes. And ſo ſir William Wicham was B. of Wincheſter, and Chancellor of England. The 4 of May the king made a compoſition in his Parliament betwéne the two Vniuerſities of the one part, and the 4 orders of friers mendicants abiding within the ſame Vniuerſities on the other part, which before had continued many yéeres in ſtrife, to the great decay of learning, and much other hurt to both parties.

This yere deceased the gentle Knight Syr Walter de Maine in the Citie of London, wherof all the Barons of England were right sory, for the truth and good counsaile that they had alwayes séne and heard in him: he was buried with great solemnity in the Monastery of Charterhouse Monkes, which he had founded besides London, and at the day of his Obsequie, there was present the King and al his children, with the Prelates, Barons and Knights of England. His lands both in England and beyond the sea fell to the Earle of Penbroke, who had to wife the Lady Anne, his daughter and heire. Also the valiant Knight Sir William Molineux, who had long serued in Fraunce, and was made Knight Banneret by the blacke Prince, at the battell of Nasars, now returning out of France died at Canterbury, about the feast of S. Iohn Baptist. Also Sir Iohn Mandeuile Knight, a man worth the memory, borne in S. Albons, deceased, this man from his tender yéres so addicted himselfe to study, that therein he accounted a great part of his ioy and felicitie to consist, for he reckoned that his worshipfull parentage little auailed, vnlesse he enabled the same by learned skil, and literature, hauing therefore wel furnished his minde with knowledge in the Scripture, he erected his studie to Phisicke, being an Art very séemely and worthie a gentlemanlike nature, but among all other things, his desire was very great to sée Asia, and Aphrica, being two mightye portions or parts of the world, furnishing himselfe therefore, he like an other Vlisses, being knowen of verie fewe of his olde acquaintance set forward.

In this his voyage he painefully visited the Countries of Scythia the greater & the lesser, Armenia, Aegypt, both the Countries of Libya, Arabia, Syria, Media, Mesopotamia, Persia, Grecia, Illyricum, Tartaria, and other kingdomes: finally hauing attayned the knowledge of diuers tongues, lest the varietie, and wonders of so many and so great things as he had seene with his eyes, and borne away by memorie, should be vtterly drowned in oblivion, he wrote exactly in the Latine, French, and English tongues, these workes following, viz. his Itinerarie of three and thirtie yeeres, of the maruaples of the world, and the description of Countries: being returned into England, and noting the euill abuses of that his age and time, the godly gentleman would say, (in these our times now it may be truelier said then euer afore) that vertue is laid aside, the Church is troden downe, the Cleargie erreth, the deuill raigneth, simony beareth sway, &c.

At length he died at Leiden, the 17. of November, 1371. and was buried in the Abbey of the Williammites, thus farre Bale. Epitaph of sir Iohn Mandeuil.

Here lieth the Noble man Sir Iohn de Mandeuille, otherwise surnamed Knight at the beard, Lord de Campdi, borne in England, a professor of Phisick, a very deuout man in prayer, and a most bountifull bestower of his goods on the poore, who after he had trauayled almost ouer the whole world, ended his life at Leiden, the yeere of our Lord 1371. the seuenteenth of Nouember.

This is the inscription in the stone, sayeth Ortelius, in which there is grauen, the Image of an armed man, with a lion at his feete, with a two forked beard, at his head a hand blessing, with these words in French, You that passe by, for charitie say prayers for me.

The shield of his armes was voyde, they said there was within it a plate, and his armes ingrauen therein, to wit, a Lion Argent, with a red crescent at his breast in a blewe field, with a border indented Or: there was shewed his knives, his furniture for horse, and his spurres, which he vsed in his trauailes through the world.

John Duke of Lancaster entred Fraunce with a strong power, and passed through the Realme without battell, but in the desertes and mountaines of Aluerne, for lacke of victualles, many of his armie died: from thence, he went to Burdeaux, and brought scantly forty horses backe with him: it was commonly talked that he lost thirtie thousand horses in that unluckie voyage. It was a great miserie to see the poore state of the men of warre, such as were Knights of great wealth in their Countrey, having lost men and horses, were glad to beg from doore to doore, and found no relefe, for the Countrey was destroyed, and not manured, by reason whereof, such dearth was in that Countrey, that victuals could scant be gotten for any mony: the Duke yet wintered there. The tenth of Aprill following, a day of battell was appoynted betwixt him and the Duke of Anjow at Tholouse. In the meane time, truce was taken til the twentieth of May next following, but the King of England knew nothing of it: When the day came, a great power of armed men for the French appeared, the which the Duke of Anjow had assembled, but yet that day passed without battell, to the great shame and reproch of the English, for the Frenchmen said, they were ready in fielde the day appointed to loke for their comming, that came not at all, wherefore they spake many reprochfull words against the Englishmen, calling them false cowards, and heartlesse. And such was the end of that iourney. Ann.reg.47. 1373. Tho. Walsing.

In a Parliament it was graunted that the cathedrall Churches should enioy their elections, & that from thence forth the King should not write against the elected, but should by his letters helpe towards their confirmation, but this statute toke small effect: but the Cleargy graunting a tenth, and the laitie a fiftéen, it was paid. Iohn Thursby Archbishop of Yorke deceased, he began the new quire of the Cathedrall Church of Yorke, vnto the which in the laying of the first stone, he gaue 500. markes, and euery yéere after whilest he liued 200. pound to ỹ same worke. Iohn Duke of Lancaster, William Earle of Salisbury, Reignold Lord Cobham, with Simon Sudbury and other, assembled at Bridges to treate a peace betweene the realmes of England and France, where met with them the Duke of Aniow, and many other nobles of France. This treaty continued almost two yéeres, and ended without conclusion of peace, but on a truce, which scantly continued one yéere.

Also Iohn Hastings Erle of Penbroke, who was taken of the Spaniards, foure yéeres since was deliuered by Henry the baskard King of Spaine vnto Bertram Cleyken constable of France, for a certaine summe of money, which the said Henry did owe to the said Bertram, who when he was brought to Paris, and the summe of his ransome was limited to be 6000. Franks, the Lombards in Bridges became sureties therefore, and promised paiment thereof, but he began to be sicke, so that the Frenchmen fearing least he should die in their hands, or euer they should get his ransome, made haste to bring him to Caleis, notwithstanding he died before he came there, and the Frenchmen were deceiued of their purpose.

The Ile of Constantine was deliuered to the French King, to the great detriment of England, for which cause afterward Sir Iohn Ansley appeached Thomas Catrington of treason. A great heate was in England, so that many both men and women died thereof.

Good Parliament.

A Parliament commonly called the good Parliament, was holden at Westminster, in the which, when a subsidie was demanded, answere was made by Peter de la More, Prolocutor of the Parliament, that the King néeded not the substance of his poore Subiectes, if he were well and faithfully gouerned, which he offered to proue effectually, and promised that if it were found that the King had néede, his subiects should be readie most gladly to helpe him according to their power.

The Knights required to haue the Lord Latimer with other, remoued from about the King, whom they said did giue him euill counsell, which being done, certaine Prelates, Earles, and other, were ordained to gouerne the King, who then was an olde man, but this endured not long. The commons also requested to haue remoued out of the Kings house, a certaine proud woman called Alice Pierce, who by ouermuch familiaritie that she had with the King, was cause of much mischiefe in the realme, she exceeding the manner of women, sate by the Kings Iustices, and sometimes by the Doctors in the Consistories, perswading and disswading in defence of matters, and requesting things contrary to lawe and honestie, to the great dishonour of the King.

The eight day of June, Prince Edward departed out of this life in the Archbishops Pallace in Canterburie, who was in his time the flower of Chiualrie: he was in the feast of S. Michael the Archangell, with great solemnitie buried at Canterburie in Christs Church, and then King Edward created Richard sonne of Prince Edward, Earle of Chester, Duke of Cornewall, and Prince of Wales. Blacke prince deceased. Adam Merim.

This yeere in the moneth of June, the seruants and tenants of the Earle of Warwike maliciously rose against the Abbey and Couent of Euesham, and their tenants, doing their worst to destroy the same for euer, beating their seruants, & killing some of them, & comming to the mannors of the Monkes, they brake down the pales of their parks & burnt them, slew their deere, they brake the hedges of the pondes & fish poles, let out the water, toke the fish, and did many other domages, minding to haue destroyed the house, and ouerthrowen the wals if the King had not sent commandement to ỹ Earle to restraine these malefactors, and troublers of the peace, thus for feare of the King, and mediation of frends, a peace was made, but no sufficient recompence, for the domage was much more then ỹ parties were able to make amends for: because of this presumption of the Earle, the King put him out of his counsel, & would not be gouerned by ỹ other Lords that were appointed therunto by parliament, but he sent for the Duke of Lancaster againe to gouerne the realme, by which occasion all they that before were banished the Court, came againe, as the Lord Latimere, Alice Pierce, and other, whose counsell he followed euen to the end of his life. The foresaid Alice is made so familiar with the king, as also her companions, that is to say, the Lord Latimere, and Sir Richard Stirie, that at their becke, the King promised all matters of the Realme to be disposed, whereupon they being desirous to be reuenged vpon their accusers, ceased not vntil by the kings and Dukes authoritie they had gotten Sir Peter de la More, to the kings court, whom without any answere, against all iustice, they sent to the Castle of Newarke, there to be imprisoned. The Duke now laboured against William Wicham Bishop of Winchester, taking occasion by al wayes & meanes he possibly could to indomage him, at the last amongst other things that he obiected against him, he charged him to haue bẽn false vnto the King, at what time he was Lord chancellor, & although the bishop in declaring of his innocencie was ready to bring forth for himselfe both sufficient reasons and witnesses, yet notwithstanding he caused him to be condemned without making answere, William Skipwith being Iustice, and by the Kings authoritie toke from him all the temporall goods of his Bishoprick, and that he might get the peoples fauour, he moued the King to giue the said goods to the Prince called Richard of Burdeaux, and so he vsed the yong Princes name for his owne helpe. Furthermore, in the Kings name, he forbad the Bishop to presume to come within xx. miles of the Kings presence. Boccace dyes aged 62. Peter de la More imprisoned. The Duke indomageth the Bishop of Winchester. W. Wicham Bishop of Winchester deprined of his temporall goods.

In the meane time the Kings sicknesse increased, and Physitions began to dispayre of his recouery, although the forenamed Alice together with Isabell her daughter did lie by him euery night. The Duke now who determined all matters How the earle of March auoided the deceite of the Duke of Lancaster.

matters of the Realme, commanded Mortimer Earle of Marche to go to Calis, where hauing set al things in order, he should diligently view al the other Castles neere there about, but the Earle as he was a man of a good wit, considered that it was a dangerous time, and that the Duke had an olde hatred against him; more he called to remembrance, how the Duke had vniustly imprisoned Sir Peter de la More, his steward, and had oppressed the Bishop of Winchester whom he had exempted from priuiledge of the kings pardon, and desired to doe the like to him, if he could, he chose therefore rather to lose the rod, then his life, wherefore he restored the rod of his Marshalship vnto the Duke, saying he would not for a small commoditie wrappe himselfe into so great daunger.

Henry Percy made Marshal of England

The Duke reioycing that he might with some honour reward Sir Henry Percie, presently gaue vnto him the rod, and made him Marshall of England, and by this meanes Sir Henry Percie was ioyned to the Duke, but incurred as much hatred of the whole communaltie, as he had gotten fauour and loue of the Duke.

An. reg. 51.

The King kept his Christmasse at Hauering Aboure, where then for the great infirmitie of his body in his veines he lay sicke.

Parliament at London.

The Duke vsing the kings authority, directed warrants to al the Lords, & Barons of the Realme, that after Christmas on Monday, 15. dayes after S. Hillary, they should come to the Parliament at London, wherein the matters of the Realme were to be talked of. To this Parliament came Richard of Burdeaux the Prince, with a great number of Noble men, and Knights, whom the Londoners at his comming presented with diuers honourable giftes, and the Duke of Lancaster also, seemed to honor him aboue the rest, placing him in the Kings seate, & taught him to demaund, that they would giue the King two tenths in one yeere, or els of al the marchandise sold in the realme of England for one yeere vi.d. of euery pound, of euery firehouse one peny, and of euery knights fee, one pound of siluer, & presently the Duke prosecuted the demand, saying that of necessity one of those poynts ought to be granted, for that the enemies had now proclaimed warre, & would inuade the realme. The knights of the Parliament, whom the Duke had made at his pleasure, desired respite, they might deliberately answere him, for all the other knights that in the last Parliament had stoutely stand with the communalty, he had caused to be remoued, except twelue whom hee could not remoue, a day was appointed them. Of the greater part, master Hungerford was elected to deliuer their answere, who was a knight very familiar with the duke, and was his Steward. Those few whom we haue said to haue remained, endeuoured that Sir Peter de la More might deliuer their answere, and also to answere all obiections that should be laid against him in presence of the Lords. And further, if he should be found faultie, to submit himselfe to the iudgement of the noble men present, but the knights preuailed nothing in their sute. For when one of the knights urged the matter more then other, he was willed to holde his peace, otherwise it might cost him his life. Whilest these things were in handling, a subsidie was demaunded for the king of the whole Cleargie. They therefore treating

ting of this matter, first made a common complaint before the Archbishop of Canterbury, of the iniury offered vnto their brother William Wicham Bishop of Winchester, which was also iniury vnto them al, and to the whole libertie of the Church, wherfore they affirmed they would not treat of other matters, vntill all the number of the Cleargie were together, for they pitying his fall, were moued against the Archbishop, thinking him a great hired man for the Duke, and notwithstanding the Archbishop affirmed, the foresaid Bishop to be prohibited by the King, not to come nere vnto his presence, yet least he should be compelled, he sent a commaundement for him, that he should come vp to the Conuocation of the Cleargie at London, who making no delay, came with a small number of seruants, that before time was thought to excell all other in multitude attending vpon him, he was ioyfully receiued of his fellow Bishops.

The Cleargie requireth the reuocation of the Bishop of Winchester.

In the meane time the Duke ceased not with his fellowes to imagine how he might bring that to passe, which he had long conceiued in his minde: for he saw that it would be hard for him to obtaine his purpose, the Church standing in his full state, and verie daungerous to attempt publikely to doe those things, the lawes and customes of London being in force, wherefore he laboured first to ouerthrow, as well the liberties of the Church, as of the Citie: for the which cause, he called vnto him a certaine diuine, who many yeres before in all his acts in the schooles, had inueyed against the Church, for that he had bene depriued by the Archbishop of Canterbury from a certaine benefice that he vniustly (as was said) was incumbent vpō within the Citie of Orford, his name was Iohn Wiclife, who with his disciples, were of the common people called Lollards, they went bare-footed, and basely clothed, to wit, in course russet garments down to the heeles, they preached, especially against Monks, and other religious men that had possessions, &c. Amongst other things, he denyed the bishop to haue authoritie to excommunicate any person, and that any Priest might absolue such a one as well as the Pope:

The duke sendeth for Iohn Wiclife.

T. Walsingham.

That neither the King, nor other secular Lord could giue any things perpetually to any person of the Church:

That (as he affirmed) in the time of William Rufus it was practised in England, for whom, as for other Kings of the Realme (notwithstanding he toke away the Church goods (the Church of England prayeth, which if she do lawfully, then she doth well: and to say she doth it vnlawfully, were absurd.

That the temporall Lords (if they had neede) might lawefully take the goods of such religious persons, to releeue their necessities, &c. When he had taught these and many other, not onely in the Schooles at Orford, but also had preached them publikely in London, that he might thereby get the fauour of the Duke and others, whom he had found prone to heare his opinion, not onely Lords, but also certaine Citizens of London, (for he was not onely eloquent, but also seemed to contemne temporall goods, for the loue of eternall riches, and therefore his conuersation was with those religious that had no possessions, and adioyned himselfe vnto the begging Friars, approuing their pouertie, and extolling their perfection) The Duke I say, and Sir Henry

Percy

Percy, commended highly his opinions, and endeuoured to extoll his learning and honestie of life aboue all other. Who therefore being thus set forth with their fauour, feared not to spread his doctrine, much more then before, going from Church to Church, and preaching his opinions. Whereupon at length, the Bishops wakened their Archbishop, who sent for this Iohn to come and answere to those things that were spoken of him. And the Duke hearing thereof, sent for foure Doctours of Diuinitie, one of euery order of the begging Friars, aduertising them, that with a naturall and olde hate, he pursued the religious persons that had possessions, neither was it difficult to compell the willing Friars to ayde him in this point.

Discord in Paules church at London.

Iohn Wiclife was to appeare before the Bishops on Thursday the nineteenth day of February there to be conuicted, for words that he had spoken, who, after the ninth houre, the Duke, and Sir Henry Percy, and diuers other assisters going before him, was brought forth, not only ỹ common sergeants, but also Sir Henry Percy himselfe, who was chiefe Marshal of England being by the way animated by his fauourers, not to feare the Bishops, neither the concourse of the people, seeing that he was walled in with so many Knights and other: he was brought into Saint Pauls Church, where such a multitude of people was gathered together to heare him, that it was hard for the noblemen to passe through: that he might escape death intended him by many Bishops. And first a dissension being raised betwéne the noblemen & Bishops, it was thought his answere should haue béen deferred. But when the people being gathered round together, stayed to giue place vnto the noblemen, Sir Henry Percy abusing his authority, pricked forwards the people, which the Bishop of London seeing, prohibited him to exercise such authoritie in the Church, saying, that if he had knowen he would haue vsed himselfe so there, he should not haue come into the Church, if he could haue letted him. Which the Duke hearing, and being offended, protested, that he would exercise such authoritie whether he would or not. When they were come into our Ladies Chappell, the Duke and Barons, with the Archbishop and Bishops sitting downe, the foresaid Iohn was also sent in by Sir Henry Percy, and by him willed to sit downe, for because (said he) he hath much to answere, he hath néede of a better seate. On the other side, the Bishop of London affirmed it to be against reason, and also contrary vnto Lawe, that he should sit, who there was cited to answere before his ordinary: hereupon very contumelious words did arise betwéne Sir Henry Percy, and the Bishop, so that the whole multitude began to be troubled, and then the Duke began to reprehend the Bishop with lowte words, and the Bishop to turne the like to the Duke againe: whereupon the Duke being angry that he could not in this strife preuaile, sware that he would pull downe both the pride of him, and of all the Bishops in England, and added, thou trustest (said he) in thy parents, who can profite thée nothing. The Bishop answered, I trust not in my parents, nor in the life of any man, but in God, in whom I ought to trust: then the Duke whispering in his eare, said, he had rather draw him forth of the Church by the haire of the head, then to suffer such things at his hand.

The

The Londoners hearing these words, with a loude voyce cryed out swearing they would not suffer their Bishop to be thus iniuried, and that they would rather lose their liues then their Bishop should be dishonestly vsed in his Church, or pulled out as was threatned. Their furie was the more increased against the Duke, for that the day before in the Parliament at Westminster, the Duke being president: It was requested in the Kings name that from that day forward there should be no more Maior of London, according to the auncient custome, but a Captaine should be appointed, and that the Marshall of England, as well in the citie as in other places, might arrest such as offended, with many other things, which were manifestly against the liberties of the Citie: which being once heard Iohn Philpot a worthy Citizen arose, and answered, &c.

Councell at London against the Duke.

The morrow after, the Londoners assembling themselues together, tooke counsell vpō such demaunds, as the day before the Lords T. of Woodstocke, and Sir H. Percy had had concerning the creation of a Captaine in the Citie, and of the vse of the Marshals office, &c. Besides of the iniurie that was offered to their Bishop, and other matters: and whilest there was great adoe and long talke about these things, there entred into the Citie the Lord Fitzwalter, and Guido Brian, whether to know their minds, or for other wise vncertaine, but the commons scarcely held their hands from beating them that came vncalled for, til at the length they had sworne their comming was not for any hurt vnto them or the city. The Lord Fitzwalter hauing gotten fauor at ẏ citizens hands, began his Oration, the effect whereof was, that he being by ancient inheritance standard bearer to the city, was to take iniuries offered vnto them, as vnto himselfe, & therefore willing them to loke to their defence, they presently tooke armor, and ranne with great rage to the Marshals Inne, they brake vp the gates, and drewes, brought out a prisoner gyues & al, wherein his fete were fastned, intending to burne them in the midst of the city, Sir Henry Percy is sought for, the armed men ran vp and downe, but all in vaine, for that day he and the Duke were to dine with one Iohn of Ipre, but the Londoners knew it not: For they thought that he and the Duke had bēn at the Sauoy, and therefore with all haste posted thither, but one of the Dukes knights seeing these things, in great haste came to the place where the Duke was, and after hee had knocked and could not get in, hee saide to Hauerland the Porter, if thou loue my Lord and thy life, open the gate, with which words, he got entry, and with great feare hee telles the Duke, that without the gate were infinite numbers of armed men, and vnlesse he tooke great heede, that day should bee his last. With which words, when the Duke heard them, he leapt so hastily from his oysters, that he hurt both his legges against the fourme: wine was offered to his oysters, but hee would not drinke for haste, he fledde with his fellowe Syr Henry Percy, no man following them, and entring the Thamis neuer stinted rowing vntill they came to a house neere the Manor of Kenington (besides Lambeth) where at that time the Princesse was, with the yong Prince, before whom hee made his complaint. The Princesse hauing heard their talke, comforted them, promising that they would make a finall ende of all those matters.

The common people of the Citie not knowing that the Duke was fled, in great fury hasted to the Sauoy, and a priest chaunced to méete them, asked of some what that businesse meant. Whereunto he was answered, that they went to take the Duke and the Lord Percy, that they might be compelled to deliuer to them, Sir Peter de la More, whom they vniustly kept in prison: the Priest said that Peter de la More was a traytour to the King, and was worthy to be hanged. With which words they all cried, this is Percy, this is the traytour of England, his speech bewrayeth him, though he be disguised in apparel: then ran they all vpon him, striuing who should giue him his deaths wound, after they had wounded him, they caried him to prison, where he died. The Bishop of London, William Courtney, hearing that the Citizens hasted to the Sauoy, left his dinner and met with them, admonishing thē to be mindfull of the holy time, (for it was Lent) and for the loue of Christ to leaue off frō such seditious doings, affirming that he would bring all things that were done against them to good ende. And doubtlesse had not the Bishop assuaged their mad moodes, the Duke and the Lord Percy had that day lost their liues, but by the Bishops meanes the matter was pacified for the time, and euery man got him to his owne house. Then were the Dukes armes hanged vp reuersed in signe of treason, in the most principall stréetes of ỳ citie, vncertaine by whom: all that ware the Dukes signe or colours, were faine to hide them, conueying them from their necks, into their bosome. The Princesse (wife to Edward late deceased) desirous to make peace, sent vnto London these Knights, Albert de Vere, Simon Burley, and Lewes Clifford, to perswade them, to make peace with the Duke, vnto whom the Citizens made answere, that they would doe for her honor, whatsoeuer she had commanded, but yet they enioyned ỳ knights, to will the Duke, that he should suffer the Bishop of Winchester to come to his answere, and to be tried by his péeres, and also to permit Peter de la More to answere for himselfe, after the custome of the lawe: and as for the third, they said they would account a traytor whersoeuer he should be found. The said Knights no otherwise then they had heard of the Citizens, reported vnto the Duke with ful mouth, whereby they made the Duke very wofull, for whereas they had spoken of a traitor, this (said he) they speake of me, though it be not true.

A priest being taken to be sir H. Percy was slaine.

The Londoners hauing held a councel about this matter, sent of their chief Citizens, either to iustifie, or to excuse that which had hapned, who suing long to come to the kings presence, being kept backe by the duke, at ỳ length the duke tolde them that the King was very euill at ease, and that his sickenes might be increased, if that he were moued to anger, by their spéech. But the citizens, whose chiefest man and speaker was Iohn Philpot answered the Duke, that they were not come, by any meane to augment the Kings sickenesse, but rather to mitigate his gréefe, that he might be strong to defend them. Moreouer, they said they were charged not to communicate those matters which they had in commission from the citie vnto any other then vnto their liege Lord the King. At length hauing gotten accesse, they shewed vnto the King, howe how it had been published in the Parliament, that it was his will, that contrary to their liberties, the Maior should be deposed, and a Captaine created, and other matters in the Parliament, which sounded against their liberties. Also they excused themselues of diuers things which had been done during the time of the commotion of the communaltie of the citie, saying they were not priuie to any such doing, but ỳ amongst so great a multitude, some lewd people had done such things, neither so great a multitude could be moued by the exhortation of the Maior, when they were once vp together. The King being a little cheered vp with their comming, answered, that he would not the diminishing of their liberties, no, he was rather ready, if neede were, to augment them, neither did any such resolutions euer come out of his mouth, and therefore, he willed them not to feare, but to returne and appease the Citizens, and to keepe them in peace.

The Londoners goe to the King about their liberties.

Diffamers of the Duke excommunicated.

In the meane space some men ceased not to make rymes in reproch of the Duke, and to fasten them in diuers places of the Citie, whereby the greater fury of the people might be kindled, the Dukes fame blotted, and his name had in detestation. Which thing when the Duke heard, he requested the Bishops to pronounce sentence of excommunication vpon all those that by such rymes maliciously did hurt his fame. The Bishop of Bangor therefore (the Aldermen of the Citie assisting him) publikely excommunicated all those that diffamed the Duke, &c.

A great subsidie graunted.

A few dayes after the Duke went vnto the Parliament, that for the causes expressed had been pretermitted: the Duke and noble men being set, they demaunded an answer of the knights of the shires, of these things which had bin demaunded of them: who answered, that they would to helpe their soueraigne Lord the king graunt, not of euery house one penny, but of euery person, man or woman about the age of fourtéene yéeres one groat throughout England, so that the mony should be gathered into the hands of certaine Earles and Barons vntill they saw how such a summe should be spent. The cleargie also graunted the like subsidy, for helpe of the King, of euery head, as well religious men as women, as secular priests one groate, if they were not promoted, but of euery religious person promoted twelue pence.

Robert Aston speaketh for the Duke.

The duke hauing obtained as he desired, the care of al the heads of the whole realme, was not yet quiet, for the iniury done against him by the Londoners: wherefore he caused the king to send for the Maior, Aldermen and Shiriffes of London, who being brought into the kings chamber of presence, (being then at his manour of Shine) they found the king placed in a chaire, not able well to speake, for the griefe of his sicknes, & the Archbishop, with other Bishops, the Duke and the kings sonnes with many Lords & men of honour sitting about him. Where after due reuerence made, and silence commaunded, Sir Robert Aston began an oration, perswading the Citizens to confesse their great and hainous offences against the king, and Duke, & to submit themselues to their mercy. Whereunto the Londoners answered, that they had not conspired against the Duke, neither had there been any shamefull thing spoken or done against him that they did knowe of, or consent vnto, which thing they were ready to proue before their soueraigne Lord the King, and the Duke himself: Yet not withstanding they affirmed, that they could not stay the folly of the common people, by whom that which had chanced was committed: wherefore the said Citizens requested the King that he would not punish those that were innocent and ignorant of the fact; but they for reuerence of the King, promised the Duke, that they would indeuour themselues to bring in the common people, and to compell them by lawe to make due satisfaction; and more (said they) we are not able to doe for the Duke, that may be to his honor. And at this word, with the Kings will, they were dismissed, full merry when they saluted the Court with their backes.

A procession of the Citizens of London.

After this the King sent vnto them, secretly commaunding them to call all the Citizens together, and to make one ware Candle or Taper with the armes of the Duke his sonne, in the same Taper, and carry the same in a solemne procession to Saint Pauls Church, there continually to burne before the Image of our Lady, continued at the charges of the citie. The ware Taper therfore being made, the Citizens by voyce of the crier, are generally called together, at which call, they come to heare the cause of their calling, but the communaltie and those of the power sorte contemned to be present at such a procession, and therefore with indignation euery one departed home to his house, only the worshipful and best sorte of the Citizens make the procession, placing the Taper of ware where they were commaunded. But the Duke not contented with this satisfaction, he threatned the Citizens, and said, that that which they had done was nothing gratefull vnto him, nay said he, it rather redoundeth to my great shame, chiefely, for that while he was aliue and well in health, they had in such sorte offered his armes wrought in a ware Taper.

3 1377. On the other side, the Citizens affirmed that they had expressely done that which his father had commanded them, and would haue done any thing that might haue pleased him. To whome the Duke answered, that they knewe his minde, and were not ignorant howe to make satisfaction: with which wordes the Citizens were much troubled, for (quoth they) amongest themselues, he would haue vs to proclaime him King: but this shall neuer be done, and so they departed, worse friends the they were before. And the Duke ceased not till he had put downe Adam Staple Maior, in whose place Nicholas Brembar was elected, and on the nine and twentith of March toke his oth at the Tower of London. Also the Aldermen were deposed and other set in their places.

Maior and Aldermen of London deposed.

Sir Iohn Minstarworth Knight who had trayterously forsaken the English armie, at that time when Sir Robert Knowles was sent to inuade Fraunce, was drawne, hanged and quartered on the 12. of Aprill, his head was set on London bridge, and his foure quarters were sent to foure principall cities of England.

In the meane time William Wicham Bishop of Winchester, seeing the lawes of the land to be handled, not according to iustice, but as it pleased certaine persons, and being destitute of all mens helpe, he turned himselfe to womankind, manking, prouiding not onely for himselfe, but also for the oppression and losses of his Church. Therefore, knowing that Alice Piers could do al things that she would, and there was not any man ỹ would in any thing resist her will, he requested her helpe, he offered her money, he promised her great frendship, if she could helpe his Bishoprieke forth of such troubles: she promised easily to dispatch his cause, and not refusing that which was offered, went to trie if any sparke of loue yet remained in the King. He therefore that long had bẽn taken with her loue, entised with her speech, supposed nothing to be denied her now that she asked: against the Dukes will, he commanded his temporalities to be giuen vnto him againe, and so the Bishop by right and wrong, recouered that which was lost.

The seuentẽnth of Aprill died the Lady Mary of Saint Paul, Countesse of Penbroke, a woman of singuler example, for liuing to the honor of God, and glory of her house, in relieuing poore mens necessities, she spent her goods, that to the Dukes and Princes she shewed examples of good workes: and dying, she gaue all her substance, either to her seruants, or to diuers Churches, but especially to poore people: she founded Penbroke Hall in Cambridge, and named it Aula Mariæ de Valence in Anno. 1343.

About the same time the Earle of Salisbury, and Sir Richard Anglisison a Poyton, the Bishop of Saint Dauids, the Bishop of Hereford, Geffrey Chaucer, (the famous Poet of England,) and other, were sent into Fraunce to treate a peace, or at the least a truce for two yeere or more, but they could not obtaine any longer truce, then for one moneth, which they vtterly refused. Whereupon they stayed in Fraunce about these things, and some thinking they might safely haue passed betwixt Caleis and Douer, about fiftie taking Ship, were forthwith intercepted by the Galleyes, and were all slaine, two men and two women onely excepted, euen in the very sight of the Townesmen of Caleys, they being not able to giue them any ayde: Sir Hugh Calueley being at that present time Captaine of Caleys, toke this so great an iniurie in very euill part, especially for that it was done, whilest they were yet treating of peace, but he could not helpe it, wherefore forthwith he toke with him a number of the best and chosen out men, and purposing to requite this iniurie, made a roade into France, killing a great number of men, and brought backe with him a great bootie of artillery and cattell, the messengers returned into England, and brought nothing backe with them, but rumor and warre.

Hugh Calueley Captaine of Caleis.

King Edward sodden (as it were) with the disease of the Annuli (which time was giuen him of God to the vse of penitence) had almost sodainely died, neglecting the benefite of time that God had giuen him, like as he should neuer haue died: trusting the fond fables of the ofte named Alice, when she affirmed, he should recouer his health, so that at that time he talked rather of hawking and hunting, then of any thing that pertained to the sauing of his soule, onely he granted pardon of death for offences, throughout his kingdome to the inhabitants. Being now sodainely taken with the day of his death, he began to haue manifest signes thereof: what Alice Pierce then did, any man may iudge, Alice Pierce leaueth King Edward.

although we set them not downe in writing, for assuredly the same the king had set forth within deaths dore, she bethought her of slight, yet before she went, that all men might perceiue that she loued not the king for himselfe, but for that which was his, she tooke the ringes from his fingers, which for the royaltie of his Maiestie he was wont to weare. Thus yeelding him such thankes for his benefites, she bade him adiew, and so withdrew her selfe from him.

Death of king Edward the third.

The king being thus at the point of death, was left not onely of her the said Alice Piers, but of other the knights and Esquires, who had serued him, allured more with his gifts then his loue. Amongst a thousand there was only present at that time a certaine Priest, (other of his folkes applying the spoile of what they could lay hands on) who lamenting the kings misery, and inwardly touched with griefe of heart, for that amongst so many Counsellers which he had, there was none that would minister to him the word of life, came boldely vnto him, and admonished him to lift vp the eyes, as well of his body as of his heart vnto God, and with sighes to aske mercy of him, whose maiestie he well knew he had grieuously offended, whereupon the king listening to the words of the priest, although he had a little before wanted the vse of his tongue, yet then taking strength to him, seemed to speake what was in his mind, and then what for weakenesse of his body, contrition of his heart, and sobbing for his sins, his voyce and speech failed him, and scarce halfe pronouncing this word Iesu, he with this last word made an ende of his speech, and yeelded vp the Ghost at his Manor of Shine, (now Richmount) on the 21. day of Iune, in the yeere of our Lord 1377. and the 65. yeere of his age, when he had raigned 50. yeeres, 4 moneths and odde dayes, whose body was afterwards solemnely buried at Westminster.

This king surpassed all his predecessours, through vertue graunted to him from aboue, in a certaine excellency of magnanimity of heart, for he neuer feared any thing, or changed countenance for any misfortunate chances when they happened, a noble warrier, and fortunate, for as well by land as by sea, in warlike conflicts he obtained the victorie, gentle, familiar, & curteous as well toward strangers, as his owne countrey men and subiects, deuoute in Gods seruice, for he had the Church and members thereof in great reuerence. In worldly cares tractable, prouident in counsel, and discreet, in fine vtterance of language affable and meeke in gesture and manners well ordered and ripe, hauing compassion of the afflicted: in bestowing of benefites very liberal, in abundance of wealth modest enough, in erecting of buildings marueilous curious, bearing losses patiently, giue much to hawking & hunting, to the which, whilest he had time, as the season of the yeere gaue, he applied himselfe greatly, he was liberall in gifts, and prodigall in expences, proper of person, in stature neither such as excelled the meane bignes of men, nor yet of the lowest sort, hauing a countenance more reuerent, then was commonly in men, but rather like an Angel, in which did shine such a marueilous grace, that such as dreamed of him, hoped the day sallowing for good lucke, he gouerned his kingdome euen till his old yeeres valiantly, wisely, and royally. Now yet he did with extreame ious lust, carnall concupiscence, nor motions, of the flesh, euen in his extreame age, and so (as was thought) for his intemperancie ended his life the sooner.

He had issue by the Lady Philip his wife, seuen sonnes, Edward the blacke Prince, William of Hatfield that died yong, Leonel Duke of Clarence, Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, Edmond of Langley Earle of Cambridge, and Duke of Yorke, William of Windsor y died without issue, Thomas of Woodstocke Earle of Buckingham, and Duke of Glocester: and fiue daughters, Isabel married to the Lord Coucy, Earle of Bedford, Ioane Quéene of Spaine, Blanch that died yong, Mary married to Iohn Mountfort Duke of Brytaine, and Margaret Countesse of Penbroke. He founded Eastminster, commonly called new abbey neere vnto the tower of London, wherein he placed white monks of the order Cisteaux, to the honour of God, and our Lady of grace, according to a vow by him made, being on the seas in great perill, by meanes of a tempest: he founded an abbey for Nunnes at Dertford in Kent, he founded the kings hall in Cambridge for pore schollers, (which hall with others was suppressed by K. Henry the 8. for the foundation of Trinitie Colledge there) he also founded an Hospitall for the pope, and named it Maison de Dieu, or Gods house, in the town of Caleis, he reedified or newly builded S. Steuens Chappel at Westminster, altering the same into a colledge of a Deane, 12. secular Chanons, 12. Vicars, and other ministers & seruants, and indued it with reuenues to the value of 500. pounde by yere. He also reedified or almost newly builded the Castle of Windsor. He also augmenting the Chappell there, which his progenitors kings of England, had before erected of 8. Chanons, he added to them a Deane and 15. Chanons, 24. pore & impotent knights and other ministers. Quéene Mary was the first that brought water to that castle by Conduite, which before was watered by welles. It remaineth of record which I haue séene, that tithe hath been paied at Windsor for wine pressed out of grapes, that were wonted to grow in the little parke there.

Issue of King Edward the third.

Richard of Burdeaux.

RIchard the 2. borne at Burdeaux, the sonne of Prince Edward, being but eleuen yéres old, began his reigne the 21. day of June, in the yere of our Lord God 1377. In beauty, bounty, and liberalitie, he far passed all his progenitors, but was ouermuch giuen to rest and quietnes, louing litle déeds of armes, and for that he was yong, was misruled by yong counsell, and regarded nothing the counsels of the sage and wise men of the Realme, which thing turned this land to great trouble, and himselfe to extreme miserie, as is by these verses declared.

Ann. reg. 1.

When this King first began to raigne, the Lawes neglected were,
Wherefore good fortune him forsooke, and th'earth did quake for feare,
The people also whom he pollde, against him did rebell:
The time doth yet bewaile the woes, that Chronicles doe tell.

Vox clamantis, Ioh Gower.

The fooliſh counſell of the lewde, and yong he did receiue,
And graue aduice of aged heads, he did reiect and leaue.
And then for greedy thirſt of Coyne, ſome ſubiects he accuſed,
To gaine their goods into his hands, thus he the realme abuſed.

On the foreſaid 21. of June, before the old King was departed, the Londoners hauing certaine knowledge, ꝑ he could not liue any ſeaſon, ſent the chiefeſt and moſt worthy citizens of their citie, vnto Kenington, where the prince and his mother remained, to declare vnto the ſaid prince their ready minds, & good will to accept him for their true and lawfull King and Gouernour, Iohn Philpot being eſpecially appointed to do the meſſage, began his Oration thus,

John Philpot his Oration to the Prince.

We bring newes, moſt excellent Prince (which without great ſorrow we cannot rehearſe) of the vndoubted death of our moſt inuincible King Edward your Grandfather, who hath kept and gouerned vs, and this kingdome (as I may ſay) a long time in quiet peace; and now by the manifeſt tokens of death in him, he hath ceaſſed to be our Gouernour: wherefore we beſeech you, on the behalfe of the Citizens, and City of London, that you will haue recommended to your good grace, the City your chamber, whom we knowledge ſhortly to be our King, to whoſe rule we onely ſubmit our ſelues, and bow to your will and pleaſure vnder your dominion to ſerue in word and deede. And that we may execute further our meſſage, your reuerence knoweth, your City to be vnſpeakably troubled, for that you haue withdrawne your preſence from it, which is knowen to be ſo much at your deuotion, that the Citizens are not onely ready to ſpend their goods for your ſake, but alſo to leopard their liues. Therefore we come to your preſence, to beſeech you that it may pleaſe you to remaine there, both to the comfort of vs your citizens, and alſo to the ſurety and ſolace of your ſelfe. We further beſeech you moſt noble Prince, that you would vouchſafe to make ſome good and profitable end of the diſcord, which lately hath riſen through the malice of ſome, and not to the commodity of any, but to the hinderance and diſcommodity of many, bet wixt our Citizens, and the Duke of Lancaſter. To theſe and other like words vttered by the ſaid Iohn Philpot, it was anſwered by the Prince, and his counſell, that he would doe his endeuour to ſatiſfie their deſire in all things, and ſo being ſent away, they returned bringing glad tidings to their fellow Citizens.

The next morrow there was ſent to London, on the Kings behalfe, the Lord Latimer, Sir Nicholas Bond, Sir Simon Burley, & Sir Richard Adderbery, which in name of the new K. ſaluted the citizens with their meſſage of the new K. towardnes, who promiſed to loue them and their city, & to come to them as they had requeſted: they alſo told ꝯ citizens, how the K. had ſpoken to the duke for them, and how the Duke in all things had ſubmitted himſelfe to the kings will, that they alſo ſhould ſubmit themſelues in the ſame maner; and then the King would endeuour himſelfe that peace ſhould concluded, to the honor and commoditie of the citizens: but the citizens fearing ſuch forme of peace as might happen, anſwered, that they would not in any wiſe ſo doe, eſpecially becauſe they knew the King to be but young, and weake to helpe them in ſuch a troubleſome buſineſſe, & that their cauſe ſhould not be diſcuſſed by him, but

by

by their deadly enemies, & so they should be punished at their pleasure, if they consented to the kings request in that article. At length after talke had vpon this businesse, fiue houres together or more, they light vpon this point, that if the said knights would be bound to the citizens, that their submission should not redound to the temporall losse, or bodily harme of any Citizen, or preiudice of their Citie, they would gladly obey the kings commaundement. The knights desirous to satisfie the kings desire, and to prouide for the quietnes of the Citizens, vndertoke by othe of fidelitie, and their knighthod, that it should not be to their preiudice, but to their commodity, if they would submit themselues. This surety received, the Citizens toke their iourney towards Shine, where they found the new king with his mother, the Duke and the Dukes brethren; there were also many Bishops gathered about the dead bodie of the late king: The comming of the Citizens being knowen to the king, he straight commaunded them to be called before him, the which Citizens as before besought him to reforme the peace betwixt the Duke and them, affirming that they were readie in all things to submit themselues vnto his will and pleasure, not as though they confessed they had made any fault against the Duke, but as men that came at this time for the benefit of peace, and honour, aswel to the king, as the duke, to pacifie the hearts, and mitigate the displeasure of both.

The Duke of Lancaster and the Citizens of London made friends.

The Duke seeing them in this manner to haue submitted themselues to the king, though (as it was said) he had other matters in his head, yet fearing that he should not afterward come to so honorable conditions, if he refused this forme of peace, fell down at the kings feet, and beseeched him to take the cause in hand vnder the forme that the Londoners had erpressed, desiring therewith that they which had bin imprisoned for any dishonour offered him, might be with the kings fauour released and set at libertie: And so he did forgiue the Citizens whatsoeuer they had committed against him, and receiued them into his ful fauour, in the presence of the king, affirming with an oth that he would be their friend, and as carefull for their commodities as for his owne, and in token of an vnfained peace, he kissed euery one of them before the king, and so with quietnes, the Citizens returned home praising God, that had brought the Duke to such humilitie, who a little before had demaunded in great pride, of the Citizens for his fauour, one hundred hodgsheads of wine, & an infinite number of precious stones. The Friday next following the Duke and Citizens came to Westminster, where was proclaimed the vnion and agreement betwene them.

The king at ordeth the Duke and the Bishop of Winchester.

The yong king desirous at his entring to the kingdome to haue an vnitie amongst his subiects in euery place, brought the Duke and the Bishoppe of Winchester to be at one, and wheresoeuer in his Realme he knew any discord and variance to be risen, he toke the quarels into his hands, promising to make a good and fruitfull end for both parties. He also deliuered Peter de la More, (a knight of Herefordshire) out of the Castell of Nottingham, where he had bene long imprisoned, and by his letters patents released him of all things whatsoeuer, in the name of the king might be laid vnto him.

Peter de la More set at libertie.

The Frenchmen take the towne of Rye and burne it.

Upon the feaſt day of Saint Peter and Paule the Apoſtles in the morning, the Frenchmen with fiue veſſels, great and ſmall, inuaded the towne of Rye, and with ſmall labour toke the towne, albeit the towne dwellers vpon confidence of ſtrength, had taken order that none ſhould remoue their goods from the towne, that at the leaſt wiſe, for loue of their goods, they might with more courage abide the conflictes: yet notwithſtanding they turne their backs in the time of battell, whereupon it came to paſſe, that by their want of heart and courage, the towne was taken with all their goods.

The Abbot of Battayle hearing of ſo lamentable a report, put his men in armor to defend the villages nigh adioyning, & one of the enemies going forth for forage, being taken by one of the Abbots men, declared that the French men purpoſed to kéepe the ſaid towne for ten daies, whereupon the Abbot remoued with his power to the towne of Winchelſey, which towne (as the priſoner reported) the French purpoſed to aſſault, but when they ſaw the Abbot and his men armed in that towne, diſpairing of further entrance into that Countrey, they begin to ſet fire on the towne of Rye, and within fiue houres brought it wholy vnto aſhes, with the Church that then was there of a wonderfull beautie, conueying away foure of the richeſt of that towne priſoners, and ſlaying 66. left not aboue eight in the towne: 42. hogſheads of wine they caried from thence to their Ships, with the reſt of their bootie, and left the towne deſolate.

King Richard crowned. Earles created Knights made

King Richard was crowned with great ſolemnity at Weſtminſter by the hands of Simon Sudbury Archbiſhop of Canterbury, on the 16. day of July. At this coronation K. Richard created foure new Earles, Thomas of Woodſtocke, K. Edwards yongeſt ſonne Earle of Buckingham and Northampton, to whom he gaue 1000. markes yéerly out of his treaſury, till he had prouided him land to that value. Thomas Mowbrey of Aſhelme, earle of Nottingham, Guiſchard or Gifford Angoliſme knight of Gaſcoigne, and maſter to the king, Earle of Huntington, to whom he likewiſe gaue 1000. markes yéerely out of his treaſury, till he had prouided him lands to that value: And Henry Percy, Earle of Northumberland. He alſo made nine knights, to wit, Edward ſonne to Edmond Earle of Kent, Iohn ſonne to Thomas Roos of Hamelake, Robert de Gray of Rotherfield, Richard ſonne to Gilbert Talbot, Gerard ſonne to Warine de Liſle, Michaell ſonne to Michaell de la Pole, Richard de Poynings, Robert de Harrington, and Thomas de la More.

Michael ſonne to Michael.

Sir Iohn Burleigh knight, the kings Chamberlaine, Cuſtos of Nottingham caſtle, was alſo for terme of life by patent, made képer of the forreſt of Sherwood. And Simon Burleigh knight his brother, was made Conſtable of Windleſore caſtle, Wigmore, Guilford, and the Manor of Kenington, and alſo maſter of the kings Falcons at his Mues, nére Charing-croſſe by Weſtminſter, this ſir Simon Burleigh had his houſe in London in Thames ſtréte betwixt Baynards caſtle & Pauls wharfe, which houſe ſomtime belonged to the abbey of Fiſcamp, & by reaſon of the wars in France came to the kings hands.

Mues for the kings falcons.

About the ſame time, Henry Percy marſhall of England, and Earle of Northumberland, reſigned the rodde of his office, and went home to his countrey, in whose place Iohn of Arundale, brother to the Earle of Arundale was sent, who valiantly resisted the Frenchmen, when they assailed the towne of South-hampton, and manfully kept them off from entring the towne, being chased to the sea.

in

About the same time, of a small cause discord rose in the fayre of Rocheborough, betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, and certaine on both sides being slaine, the Scots were put to the worse. Whereupon being turned into a fury, shortly returning to the town with the Earle of Dunbarre, they entred in the night, slue the townsmen, spoiled their goods, & committed the town to the fire: which thing being known, the new Earle of Northumberland sorowing inwardly euen at the heart for the death of the slaine townsmen, determined to reuenge their death vpon the enemies, & entring into Scotland with 10000 men, he toke praies in the land of the Earle of Dunbarre, for the space of three daies together, burning vp al that came in his way, & returned with his people. The towne of Rokesborow burned by the Scots.

The one and twentieth of August, the French men toke the vnwinnable (that I may so call it) Ile of Wight, more by craft, then by force, which Ile had not been taken by any men, if the same had been wel kept with diligent watch, but the euer assured security of the Iland men, brought on them their destruction, and to the French vnhoped for victory. In deed the Frenchmen being driuen on the shore by tempest, attempted to enter the Ile, supposing the Iland men had not been aware of their comming: but the purpose of the French was not known to the watchmen, and therefore they suffered them to enter on the land, to the ende, that after so many were come on land, as they supposed they might deale with, the residue should be kept off, but it chanced otherwise then they thought, for as we said, some being entred, when the Wightmen would haue stopped the other, the Frenchmen pressed forward with such force, that they repulsed the Iland men from their ground, so that they were driuen to seeke refuge by hiding themselues. French men tooke the Ile of Wight.

The French therefore hauing thus gotten the Iland, did much hurt in slaying the inhabitants, burning certaine townes, and taking the substance from the people: at length comming to the castle, and thinking to haue wonne it with final adoe, they finde there a pricke of incredible sharpnes, for Sir Hugh Tirell keeper of the said castle, boldly comming to incounter them, made great slaughter among them, by reason whereof they left from assayling that castle, and from thence forth thinking it not good to dwel so neere a Serpent, they gathered together what spoyle they might of the Ile, and constrained the Islanders to get of their friends without the Ile, a thousand marks of siluer for the saning of their houses from burning, and for the residue of their goods. Moreouer, taking of them an oath of fidelitie, not to resist thē for the space of one yeere, whensoeuer it should please thē to land there, they departed thence to their galleies, and againe coasted the shore about till they came to the town of Winchelsea, where vnderstanding the abbot of Battal was come to defend it, they sent him word to redeeme the town, vnto whom the abbot answered, he neded not to redeem the thing that was not lost, but willed the to desist from molesting the towne vpon paine of that which might follow. The French exasperated The French besiege Winchelsea. The Abbot of Battal defended it.

asperated with this answere, requested him that if he would not haue peace he would send forth to fight man to man, or more in number if he would to try the matter in view of armes: but neither would the Abbot admit the one request or the other, saying, he was a religous man, and therfore not to admit such petitions, and that he came not thither to fight, but to defend & preserue the peace of the countrey. These things being heard, the Frenchmen supposing that the Abbot and his people wanted courage, they assaulted the towne with such instruments of warre, as cast forth stones farre off, not ceasing from none til euening, but by the laudable prowes of the Abbot, and such as were with him, the French preuailed nothing, but left it as they founde it.

Use of Guns.

The towne of Hastings burnt.

In the meane time whilest they were busie thus at Winchelsey, they sent part of their company vnto Hastings, where finding the towne almost emptie, they burnt it.

Prior of Lewes taken by French.

The same yere the Frenchmen comming vp at Ratingdon in Sussex, nere to the towne of Lewes, the Prior of Lewes with a small company met them, and was taken by the Frenchmen, that came vpon him, and caried to their ships, with two knights, to wit, Sir Iohn Fallesbey, and Sir Thomas Cheyne, and an Esquier called Iohn Brokas, amongst other a certaine Esquier that had bene long in seruice with the Prior of Lewes, a Frenchman by nation, fought so manfully against the Frenchmen, that his bowels falling from him to his feete, he yet pursued them. There was slaine in this battel about one hundred of the Englishmen, and the Frenchmen returned home with all their Nauie, which was 37. Galleies, and 8. Carues of Spaine, and certaine Barkes: straightwaies therefore as they came to land, some of them went vnto the siege, that was about Arde, & by treason which alwaies is familiar to them, the keeper of that castle being an Almaine, to wit, the Lord of Gunney deliuered to them the towne, they straight got the castell also, for the which the same keeper being taken by sir Hugh Calueley keeper of Caleis, was sent into England, and committed to prison.

Parliament at London.

The same time a Parliament was assembled at London, which continued from Michaelmas til S. Andrewes tide. In the which Parliament were almost all those knights, with the said Peter de la More, which so nobly had stood forth in the Parliament, which rightly was called the good Parliament, for the increase of their Countrey, and profit of their kingdome. Thus therefore taking in hand againe the petitions in the same place, as they left them, they earnestly stood in the matter, to haue Alice Pierce banished, who contemning the statute of Parliament, and the oth which she had taken, durst take on her to enter the kings court to compell him, and to haue of him what pleased her, who although she had corrupted many of the Lords, and all the lawes with money, the which not onely secretly but openly pleaded for her; yet by the diligence and wisedome of the said knights, she being conuict by her owne mouth, was banished, and her moueable goods confiscate to the kings vse: but in the yere next following, to wit, the second yere of king Richard, the said Alice Pierce then wife to William Windsore knight, was pardoned, and in the se-

There was granted to the king of the Cleargie two tenths to be paid that yere, with condition, that from henceforth the king should not extort from his Subiects by such petitions or demaunds but liue of his owne, and continue his warre, for as it was answered there, his owne goods pertaining to the crowne, sufficed both to the finding of his house, and maintaining of his warres, if the same were bestowed by fit ministers, and for the keping of the money, two Citizens of London were appointed, William Walworth, and Iohn Philpot. The Englishmen hearing of a number of Spanish shippes to remaine at sluce for want of winde, assembling a great companie of armed men, and a great Nauie, meant to take the seas: their chiefe Captaines were Thomas of Woodstocke Earle of Buckingham, the Duke of Britayne, the Lord Latimer, the Lord Robert Fiz Walter, sir Robert Knowles, and many other valiant personages, who being entred the Sea, tasted Fortune disfauourable, for by a tempestuous wind that rose, their shipswere scattered in sunder, their maskes were broken downe, their sailes rent, and many of the small vessels that were victuallers were drowned; at length the ships got together againe, and arriued in England, and being nowe rigged are eftsones fraught with men, and to they sea they goe. About the same time, sir Hugh Calueley making a iourney towards Bulloigne, found a barge in the hauen of the towne, that bare the name of the towne, and another that was the French kings, xxvi. other vessels more and lesse, all the which with a great part of the suburbes of Bulloigne, he caused to be dispoyled, taking with him whatsoeuer was there to be desired, with certaine prisoners: hee drone afore him a great bootie of sheepe and beasts, which he found pasturing nere the towne, which might well serue to victuall Calets for a great time: he recouered the same day the Castell of Marke, which through negligence before had been lost. King Richard kept his Christmas at Windlesore.

Two tenths granted by the Cleargie.

The English fleete whereof we spake, returned without any great good successe, they tooke an eight Spanish ships in the British coasts nere to Brest, and more had taken if their businesse had been so well done, as was pretended: and therefore the fleete returned home, so tossed with stormes and contrarie weather, and after with intestine discord, that it seemed there wanted among them Gods fauour. The Lord Percy (this fleete remaining for the mending of his ships, whilest the other were abroad) went now to the sea, with a great ship and some smaller vessels, and meeting with fiftie ships laden with French wares and merchandize, of which some were of Flaunders, some of Spayne, he set on them all, who beholding his bold enterprise, and thinking that he had some aide at hand gaue ouer to make resistance, and so xxviii. escaping by flight, xxii. yelded themselues to the said Thomas Lord Percy. Sir Hugh Calueley with a power secretly armed, went to the towne of Staple, where the fayre was then, to the which were come many Merchantmen from Bulloigne, Butterell, Amiens, and Paris, where he falling on them that were vnarmed, slew many, tooke many to be put to their ransomes, sacked all the goods, and set fire in the towne, so that it was wholy consumed, fewe places excepted. This done, he returned to Caleis with his men in safety, bringing from that Fayre wares which returned to the great profite of the Calisians many yeres after.

The men of Winchelsey & of Rye sayle into Normandy, and spoyle the towne of Peters Hauen

The men of Winchelsey & Rye, gathered a great number of people together, and imbarked themselues towards Normandy, desirous to requite the losses which before they had receiued, and so in the night arriuing in a towne called Peters Hauen, entred the same, slaying so many as they met, and those whom they thinke able to pay ransome, they carry to their ships: they spoyled the houses with the Churches, where they found many rich spoiles which sometime had bẽn by the Frenchmen set from Rye, and especially the belles and such like, which they shipped, set the rest on fire, & then they land at Wilet, not farre from thence, where they practised the like cheuance, and so with their rich spoyle returned home.

About the same time Iohn duke of Lancaster requested that the mony granted to the king by the cleargy and laity, might be committed to his custody, affirming that he would kẽpe the enemies off from the coastes of England, by the space of one yere with that mony, and moreouer bring to passe some further great commodity, to whose importunate petition the Lords although against their willes agreed. They appoint therfore the first day of March to mẽt in counsell, in which euery of those should goe forth on this iourney: and least the sea should in the meane time want those that should kẽpe it, there were nine ships hired of them of Bayon, to defend the sea and land from incursions of the French and others. These ships being furnished with sufficient numbers of armed men, within a short time coasting the seas, met the Nauy and merchandise of the Spanyards, and entring battell with them, in short time take fourteen of their ships laden with wines and other merchandise, and returned into England ioyfully: vnto sir Robert Knowles Captaine of Brest, they gaue the first fruits of their pray, 100. tunne of their best wines as they passed by him homewards.

In the meane time Henry the bastard, calling himselfe king of Spaine, hearing that they of Bayon had done such harme vnto his people, and that the D. of Lancaster had prepared a great number to enter the sea, he was sore afraid, thinking that hee minded not onely to defend the Sea, but rather to seeke his kingdome, which by right of his wife the lawful inheritor of Spaine, he meant to challenge: wherefore the said Henry commaunded a Nauy to be prepared of all his land that he might stay the said Duke from entering his countrey, and if he might, to take him prisoner, which happily they had done, if the king of Portugale with almost an innumerable number had not entred the kingdome of Spaine, the selfe same time that the bastard Henry prepared himselfe against the Duke, deferring his iourney from day to day: they that were appointed Captaines ouer the Nauie with certaine men of warre, got them to the sea, there to stay for the Dukes comming, esteeming it more glorious to liue on the sea by prayes, taking from the enemies, then to liue by spoyle of their owne countrimen at home.

When

When they had certaine daies watched vp and down the seas, the Spanyards met them with an armed company, so that eyther part in hope of pray ioyned together in fight, but our men hauing the wind and weather contrary to them, lost the victory to their enemies, some escaping by flight, & some being taken, amongst the which sir Hugh Courtney a noble knight was one.

About the same time Iohn Mercer a Scot, gathering together no smal number of Frenchmen, Scots and Spanyards, set vpon certaine ships of Scarborow, toke them and led them into Scotland, this he did in reuenge of his fathers iniury, who was before taken by the Englishmen, and kept prisoner in the castle of Scarborow. Mercer a Scot tooke ships of Scarborow.

Iohn Philpot a Citizen of London, a man of lolly wit, and very rich in substance, considering the want of the Duke of Lancaster & other Lordes that ought to haue defended the realme, & lamenting the oppressions of the inhabitants, hired with his own money, to the number of a thousand souldiers, the which might take from the said Iohn Mercer both his ships and goods, which he had by rouing taken, and defend the realme of England from such incursions: and it came to passe within a small time, that his hired men toke the said Iohn Mercer with all his ships, which he had violently taken from Scarborow and fifténe Spanish ships that were laden with much riches, and were with him in ayde at that present. There was great ioy made among the people, all men praising that worthy mans bountifulnes & loue towards the king. The Earles & Barons séeing so laudable an act, atchieued by Iohn Philpot, toke it grieuously, although they knew themselues guilty: first they secretly lie in wait, to do him some displeasure, and after they spake against him openly, saying, it was not lawfull for him to do such things without the counsell of the king and realme: certaine of the Lords, but the chiefe being Hugh Earle of Stafford, that rehearsed these things thus against him, were answered by the same Iohn Philpot: Sir, know (saith hée) that I neither sent my money nor men to the danger of the seas, that I should take from you, or your fellowes, the good renoume of Chiualry, and winne it to me, but being sorrowfull to see the peoples misery, in my country, which now through your slouthfulnesse, of the most noble Lady of Nations, is brought to lie open to the spoyling of euery vilest Nation, when there is not one of you that doth put his hand to the defence therof. I haue therfore set forth my selfe and mine, for the sauing of my Nation and Countrey: the Earle had not to answere. Iohn Philpot of London. Ann. reg. 2.

The eleuenth day of August, certaine wicked persons of the kings house being armed, at high Masse time entred the Church of Westminster Abbey, and there set vpon two valiant Esquiers, Iohn Schakell and Robert Hawley, which had escaped out of the Tower of London, to the said Abbey, for refuge of Sanctuarie: they slew the said Robert Hawley in the quire before the Priors stall, and slew a Monke which intreated them to spare the saide Robert in that place. Sir Ralph Ferreis, and sir Alan Buxule, Captayne of the Tower (some say the Lord Latimer) were the Captaines of this mischiefe. Murder in the Church of Westminster. T. Walsingham

Thomas of Woodstocke Earle of Buckingham, Thomas Percy, Hugh Calureley, Robert Knowles, Lord Basset, Sir Iohn Harleston, William of Windsore, appꝛoued and tried knightes, were sent with a great power to ayde the Duke of Bꝛytaine, who were conueyed to Caleis, and from thence rode about through Fraunce, spoyling the countrey, and slaying the people to the boꝛders of Bꝛytaine, and entred the same without losse, eyther of man oꝛ beast.

In this iourney Sir Iohn Philpot, Citizen of London deserued great commendations, who hyred ships foꝛ them of his owne charges, & with his owne money released the armour which the souldiours had gaged foꝛ their victuals, moꝛe then a thousand in number. John Philpot his good seruice.

The Scots entred Cumberland, Westmerland, and the Foꝛrest of Engelwood, slewe the inhabitantes, dꝛoue away the Cattell, and robbed the Market and Towne of Pereth, and whiles the Earle of Noꝛthumberland pꝛepared to haue béene reuenged, the king sent letters to the contrarie. Iohn Vian knight with the French kings Gallies tooke the Towne of Winchelsea, put the Abbot of Battaile to flight, and toke one of his Monkes that came thither armed. An. reg. 4. The eight of September foure Gallies of Fraunce came to Grauesende, and burnt a great part of the Towne, returned with great spoyles, not receiuing any hurt. The towne of Grauesend burnt by the French.

About this time saith Polidor, the making of Gunnes was found, by a certaine Almaine, who hauing the powder of Bꝛimstone in a Moꝛter which he had beaten foꝛ a medicine, and couered with a stone, as hée stroke fire, a sparke chanced to fall into the powder, whereby a flame out of the moꝛter raised the stone a great height, which after he had perceiued, he made a pipe of yꝛon, and tempered the powder with other, and so finished that deadly engine, as repoꝛteth Blondus and R. John Wickliffe.

The same time Iohn Wickliffe parson of Lutterworth in Leicester-shire laboured in his preaching to proue that after the consecration in the mas made by the Priest, very bread and wine were there present as before, Christ being there assistant, as in euery place, but more specially, & the same bread no to be more worth then other bread, except onely for the blessing of the Priest and therefore he affirmed that Christians were deceiued in honouring of the said bread, which was a thing without life, for any thing that had life, was better then that which lacked life.

An army sent to aid the king of Portugall.

A great army was assembled and sent to the aid of the Duke of Lancaster against the king of Spayne, for the said Duke affirmed, that it was expedient for this realme, that an host of men, with abundance of money should be sent to the king of Portugale, that he might thereby be bound to aide the king of England, and stop the passage of the straites of Gibraltare, or of Moroc, from the Galleies, that must of necessitie passe by the same straites, to come to infest the Britich, or English Ocean, for so should England bee safe, and Fraunce should be deceiued: Captaines appointed to this army, were Edmond Langley, Earle of Cambridge, William Lord Beauchampe, the Lord Berkerax, sir Matthew Gourney, and many other knights, the which passed the seas and prosperously came to Lysbone, and were thankfully receiued of the king: but these were not able to assaile the king of Spayne, yet greatly profiting Portugale, they defended the confines, and stayed the Spaniardes that they could not enter the countrey as enemies: our men oft times inuaded the Spaniards, and boldely abode in that land vntill a greater number of warriers might be sent vnto them out of England.

A great rebellion in England, and the causes thereof.

In this meane time, the realme of England, appointed to bee punished for her sinnes, was sodainly plagued in such sort, that if God had not sooner suppressed the same, both the gouernment had beene vtterly destroyed, and the whole realme made a laughing stocke and scorne to all nations.

In the last yeere (as is aforesaid) was granted to the king a grieuous tare or tallage of his subiects, both spiritual and temporall, through the which was raised in England, a shipwracke of great troubles: for diuers Courtiers desirous to enrich themselues with other mens goods, informed the king & his court, that the tallage was not gathered vp faithfully to the kings vse by the Collectors: whereupon they offered to the king, that they would pay a great summe of money for the farme of that which they would gather ouer and besides that which had beene paid, if they might be by the king thereunto authorised. And some of them getting the kings letters and authority, sate in diuers places of Kent and Essex, and handled the people very sore and vncourteously almost not to be spoken, for the leuying of the said summe of money, which, some of the people taking in euill part, they secretly toke counsell together, gathered assistants, and resisted the exactors, rising against them, of whom some they slew, some they wounded, and the rest fled.

The king therefore ordained certaine Commissioners to enquire, howe they were leuied, amongst the which, one was sent into Essex to Thomas de Bampton, he sitting one day before Whitsontide, at Brentwood, enquiring how the Collectors had leuied the subsidy before said, all the people of Fobbing answered, they would not pay one peny more then they had done, whereof they had his acquittance, whereupon the said T. did grieuously threaten them, hauing with him two Sergeants at Armes of the kings, whereupon they of Fobbing, of Curringham, and of Samford, assembled to the number of more then one hundred, went to T. Bampton and gaue him flat answere that they would neither treat with him, or pay any such money as was demaunded: wherefore the said Bampton commaunded the Sergeants to arrest and put them in prison, but the townsmen made them all to fly towards London to the kings counsell. Whereupon sir Robert Belknape chiefe Iustice of the common Pleas was sent downe with commission of Traylbaston, and before him sundry inditements of those men; who comming before him called him traitor to the king, and realme, and furthermore compelled him to sweare vpon a booke, that he should no more sit in any such Sessions, and to declare to thē the names of the Iurers, whose heads they chopped off as they found them, and destroyed their houses, which made sir Robert Belknape in haste to fly his house. This done the Commons assembled before Whitsontide to a great number: those toke all the Clearkes of the said T. Bampton and chopped off their heads, which they caried before them on poles. At the same time the great Prior of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem by London, hauing a goodly and delectable Manor in Essex, wherein was ordained victuals and other necessaries, for the vse of a Chapiter Generall, and great aboundance of fayre stuffe, of Wines, Arras cloathes, and other prouision for the knightes brethren: The Commons entred this Manor, eate vp the victuals and prouision of Wine, three tunne, and spoyled the Manor and the ground with great dammage: then they sent diuers letters into Kent, Suffolk, and Northfolke to rise with them, and departing themselues into diuers companies, committed many outrages: shortly after, to wit, on Monday after Whitsunday, a knight of the kings house, named sir Simon Burley, hauing in his companie two Serieants at Armes of the kings, came to Grauesend, where he challenged one to be his bondman, for whom, men of the towne did gently intreat him to shew fauour, but sir Simon would not take lesse then 300. pound of siluer for his manumission, & therefore arrested him, and sent him to Rochester Castell, whereupon the Commons of Kent began to rise, for the which the king sent a Iustice of Traylbaston, with Iohn Legge a Serieaunt of Armes, there to sit, hauing with them many inditements, but as they would haue sate at Canterbury vpon their commissiō, they were resisted by the commons, who daily grew to a great multitude, & being without a captain, came to Dartford, where they toke counsaile, and appointed that none which the Friday after, they came to Rochester, and there ioyned with the Esse they swore the Maior, Baliffes, and Commons of the Towne to be true t king Richard and the lawfull Commons of England. They beheaded thre men of that towne, and then taking with them 500. men of that towne to ward London, left the rest to kæpe the said towne. This tumult thus begun in Kent, by meane of sir Simon Burley, was also increased by diuers o ther actions in other places, amongst the which, as I finde noted in a Chro nicle sometimes belonging to the Monastery of Saint Albons one of the col lectors of the grotes, noz polle money, comming to the house of one Iohn Tylar in the towne of Dartford in Kent, demaunded of the Tylars wife, for her hus band, her selfe, her seruants, and for their daughter (a young mayden) euery one of them a grote; which the Tylars wife denied not to pay, saying for her daughter, whom she said was but a child, not to be counted a woman: quoth the collector, that will I soone wit, and taking the mayden, and turned her vp to search whether she were vnder growne with haire oz not, (for in ma ny places they made the like triall) whereupon her mother cried out, neigh bours came running in: and her husband being at worke in the same towne, tyling of an house, when he heard therof, caught his lathing staffe in his hand, and ranne reaking home, where reasoning with the Collector, who made him so bold, the Collector answered with stout wordes, and strake at the Tylar, whereupon the Tylar auoiding the blow, smote the Collector with his lathing staffe, that the braines flew out of his head, wherethrough great noyse arok in the strætes, and the powre people being glad, euery one prepared to sup port the said Iohn Tylar. Thus the Commons being drawne together, went to Maidstone, and from thence backe againe to Blacke heath, and so in short time they stirred all the Countrey, in a manner to the like commotion, and forthwith besetting the waies that lead to Canterbury, arrest all passen gers, compelling them to sweare: first, that they should kæpe their allegi ance vnto king Richard, and to the Commons, and that they should accept no king that was named Iohn, for enuy they bare vnto Iohn Duke of Lanca ster, who named himselfe king of Castile, and that they should be ready whensoeuer they were called, and that they should agree to no Tare to be leuied from thencefoorth in the kingdome, noz consent to any except it were John Tylar of Dartford slew one of the Collectors of money.

The fame of these doings spread into Sussex, Hertfordshire, Essex, and Cambridgshires, Norfolke, Suffolke, &c. and when such assembling of the common people daily toke increase, and that their number was now

made almost infinite, so that they feared no man to resist them, they beganne to shewe some such Actes as they had considered in their mindes, and tooke in hande to behead all men of Lawe, as well Apprentises, as Utter-barristers and old Justices, with all the Jurers of the countrey, whom they might get into their hands, they spared none whom they thought to be learned, especially if they found any to haue pen and inke, they pulled off his hode, and all with one voice of crying, Hale him out, and cut off his head. Justices, Lawyers and Jurers beheaded.

They also determined to burne all Court rolles and olde monuments that the memory of antiquities being taken away, their Lordes should not be able to chalenge any right on them, from that time forth. These Commons had to their Chapleine or Preacher a wicked Priest, called Sir Iohn Ball, who counsailed them to destroy all the Nobility, and Cleargy, so that there should bée no Bishop in England, but one Archbishoppe, which should be himselfe, and that there should not bée aboue two religious persons in one house, and their possessions should bee deuided among the laye men, for the which doctrine they held him as a prophet. They going towardes London met diuers Lawyers, and twelue Knights of that countrey, whom they forced to sweare to maintaine them, or else to be beheaded: this béeing knowne to the King, on Wednesday following hée sent messengers to demaund the cause of their rising. Who answered, that they were gathered together for his safety, to destroy those that were traitors to him and his kingdome: the king by messengers replied, that they should cease their assemblies vntill hée mought speake with them, and all matters should be amended. Whereupon the Commons requested the King to come and sée them on the Blacke heath, and the King the third time sent word that hée would willingly come to them the nert day. At what time the King béeing at Windsore remoued in all haste to London, whom the Maior met, and safely brought to the Tower, whither the Archbishoppe of Canterburie Chancellor, the Bishoppe of London, the Prior of Saint Iohn Treasurer, the Earles of Buckingham, Kent, Arundale, Warwicke, Suffolke, Orford, and Salisbury, and other of the Nobility, and Gentlemen to the number of fiue hundred did come, and on Corpus Christi éue the Commons of Kent came to blacke heath, three miles from London, to mete with the King, hauing displayed before them two Banners of Saint George, and three score Penons. The Commons of Esser came on the other parte of the riuer Thames, to haue also aunswere from the king, at what time the king béeing in the Tower, commaunded barges to bée made ready, and taking with him his Counsell, and foure barges for his retinue, was rowed to Grénewich, where the Chancellor and Treasurer perswaded the King that it were great follie to goe to a number of men without reason, and thereupon hée staide. The Commons therefore sent to him, requiring to haue the heades of Iohn Duke of Lancaster, and fiftéene other Lordes, whereof fourtéene were present with him in the Tower, to wit, Simon Sudburie Chancellor, Sir Robert Hales Treasurer, Lib. Eborum. Sir Iohn Bal a wicked priest, Chaplein to the rebels. The king sent messengers to the rebels, to demãd of them the cause of their rising. King Richard came to the Tower of London. The Commõs of Kent came to the blacke heath. The commons of Esser came also on the other side the Thames.

H. Knighton. More then xxx. rebels mured vp in a ſeller.

In this meane time the Commons of Kent brake vp the Fléet, and let the priſoners goe where they would: they deſtroyed and brent many houſes, and defaced the beauty of Flétéſtréte: from thence they went to the Temple to deſtroy it, and plucked downe the houſes, tooke off the tyles of the other buildinges left, went to the Church, toke out all the bookes, and remembraunces that were in hutches of the prentiſes of the Lawe, caried them into the high ſtréte, and there brent them; this houſe they ſpoyled for wrath they bare to the Prior of Saint Iohns, vnto whom it belonged: after a number of them had ſacked this Temple, what with labour, and what with Wine, béing ouercome, they lay downe vnder the walles, and houſing, and were ſlayne like ſwine, one of them killing an other for olde grudge and hatred, and others alſo made quicke diſpatch of them. A number of them that burnt the Temple, went from thence towarde the Sauoy, deſtroying all the houſes that belonged to the Hoſpitall of Saint Iohn: and after they went to the place of the Biſhop of Chelker, by the Strand, where Iohn Fordham remained elect of Durham, they entred his ſeller, rouling out the tunnes of Wine, drinking exceſſiuely, not dooing any more harme. and doth pardon to them all manner of trespasses, misprisons, and felon done before this time, and willeth and commaundeth from hence forth, th and to the whole Realme. Whereunto he set his signet in their presence, a se

sent it vnto them by two knights, one of them standing vp in a chaire aboue the rest, that euery one might heare. During which time the king remained in the Tower, to his great griefe, for when the Commons heard the writing, they said it was but a mockery, and therefore returned to London, proclaiming through the Citie, that all the men of Lawe, all they of the Chancery, and of the Exchequer, and all that could make any writ, or letter, should be beheaded wheresoeuer they might be found. The whole number of the common people, were at that time deuided into three parts, of the which one part was attending to destroy the mannor of Highbery, and other places belonging to the Prior of Saint Iohn: Another company lay at the Miles ende East of the Citie: The third kept at the Tower hill, there to spoyle the king of such victuals as were brought towards him. The company assembled on the Miles end, sent to commaund the king, that he should come to them without delay, vnarmed, or without any force, which if he refused to doe, they would surely pull downe the Tower, neither should hee escape aliue; who taking counsell of a few, by seuen of the Clocke the king rode to the Miles-end, with his mother in a whirlicote or chariot as we now terme it, & the Earles of Buckingham, Kent, Warwicke, and Oxford, Sir Thomas Percie, Sir Robert Knowles, and the Maior of London, with diuers other knights, and Esquires, Sir Aubery de Vere bare the kings sword. Thus with a few vnarmed, the king went towards the rebels in great feare: and so the gates of the Tower being set open, a great multitude of them entred the same. There was the same time in the Tower 600. warlike men furnished with armour and weapon, expert men in armes, and 600. archers, all which did quaile in stomacke. For the basest of the rusticks, not many together, but euery one by himselfe, durst presume to enter the kings chamber, or his mothers, with their weapons, to put in feare each of the men of warre, knights or other: many of them came into the kings priuy chamber, and plaid the wantons, in sitting, lying and sporting them on the kings bed: and that more is, inuited the kings mother to kisse with them, yet durst none of those men of warre (strange to be said) once with them: they came in and out like maskers, that in times past were slaues of most vile condition. Whilest therfore these rusticks sought the Archbishop with terrible noyse and fury running vp and downe, at length finding one of his seruants, they charge him to bring them where his master was, whom they named traitor, which seruant daring do none other, brought them to the Chappell; where, after Masse had beene said, and hauing receiued the communion, the Archbishop was busie in his praiers, for not vnknowing of their comming and purpose, hee had passed the last night in confessing of his sinnes, and in deuout praiers. When therfore he heard they were come, with great constancie he said to his men, Let vs now go, surely it is best to die, when it is no pleasure to liue, and with that the tormentors entring, cried, Where is the traitor? The Archbishop answered, behold, I am the Archbishop whom you seeke, not a traitor. They therfore laid handes on him, and drew him out of the Chappell, they drew him out of the Tower gates, to the Tower hill, where being compassed about with many thousands, and seeing swords

The King comming to the Miles end, the place before recited, was sore afraide, beholding the wood commons, who with froward countenance required many things which they before had put in writings to be confirmed by the kings letters patents.

The 1. that all men should be free from seruitude and bondage, so as from thencefoorth there should be no bondmen.

The 2. that he should pardon all men of what estate soeuer, all maner actions and insurrections committed, and all maner treasons, felonies, transgressions and extortions, by any of them done, and to graunt them peace.

The 3. that al men from thencefoorth might be infranchised to buy and sell in euery Countie, Citie, borough, town, faire, market, and other place within the Realme of England.

The 4. that no acre of land holden in bondage or seruice, should be holden, but for 4. pence, and if it had been holden for lesse aforetime, it should not hereafter be inhaunsed.

These and many other things they required: moreouer they tolde him, he had been euilly gouerned til that day, but from that time he must be gouerned otherwise.

Esser men returned homward.

The King perceiuing he could not escape except he graunted to their request, yeelded to the same. And because the Chancelor was beheaded, the King made the Earle of Arundale for the time Chancelor, and keeper of the great seale, and also made diuers Clarkes to write Charters, patents, and protections graunted to the Commons, for the foresaid matters, without taking fine, for the seale, or writing thereof, and so toward euen, the King craning licence departed from them. The next day being Saterday and the 15. of June, a great number of the Commons came to the abbey of Westminster, and there found John Inworth Marshall of the Marshalsey, and maister of the prisoners there, imbracing a marble pillar of Saint Edwards shrine for his defence, against his enemies, they plucked his armes from the piller, and led him into cheape, where they cut off his head. In which time they toke out of Bedstreete one John Greenfild, led him into cheape, & cut off his head, notwithstanding that the King had at this time made proclamation through the Citie, that euery one should peaceably goe into his countrey, without doing further euill, whereunto they would not assent. The same day after dinner, about two of the clocke, the King went from the wardrobe, called the Royall in London toward Westminster, attended on by the number of 200. persons, to visit Saint Edwards shrine, and to see if the Commons had done any mischiefe there: The Abbot and couent of that abbey, with the Chanons and vicars of Saint Stephens Chappell, met him in rich Copes, with procession, and led him by the charnell house into the abbey, then to the Church, and so to the high altar, where hee deuoutely prayed, and offered. Which being done, the King made proclamation, that all the commons of the countrey, that were in London should méete him in Smithfield, which was done accordingly, and when the King was come with his people, he stood with his backe towards the East, nére to Saint Bartilmewes priory, and the commons towards the West in forme of battayle. The King therefore sent to them to shew them that their fellowes the Essex men were gone from thence, and to liue in peace, and that he would graunt to them the like forme of peace, if it would please them to accept thereof. Their chiefe Captaine named Wat Tyler of Maidstone, he I say being a crafty fellow, of an excellent wit, but lacking grace, answered, that peace he desired, but with conditions to be had. The King, minding to fede the King with faire words, till the next day, that he might in ỹ night haue compassed his peruerse purpose, for they thought ỹ same night to haue spoyled the citie, the King first being slaine, and the great Lord that cleaued to him, and to haue burnt the Citie, by setting fire in foure places thereof, but God that resisteth the proude, did sodainely disappoint him.

Sir John Newton sent to Wat Tiler. where the forme of peace was in three seuerall Charters written, and they sent to him, none of them could please him: wherefore at length the King sent to him one of his Knights called Sir Iohn Newton, not so much to commune as to intreate him (for his pride was well enough knowen) to come and talke with him about his owne demands, to haue them put in his charter, of which demands, I will put one in this Chronicle, that it may the more plainly appeare, the other to be contrary to reason. First, he would haue a commission for him and his, to behead all Lawyers, escheters, and other whatsoeuer that were learned in the law, or communicated with the law, by reason of their office, for he had conceiued in his mind that this being brought to passe, all things afterward should be ordered according to the fancy of the commons people: and indéede it was said, that with great pride, he had but the day before said, putting his hand to his lips, that before 4. dayes came to end, all the lawes of England should procéede from his mouth. When Sir Iohn Newton was in hand with him for dispatch, he answered with indignation, if thou be so hasty, thou maiest get thée backe againe to thy master, I will come when it pleaseth me: notwithstanding he followed on horsebacke a slow pace, and by the way there came to him a doublet maker of London, named Iohn Tice, who had brought to the commons 60. doublets which they bought and wan for the which doublets he demaunded 30. markes, but could haue no paiment.

Pride of Wat Tiler.

Wat Tiler his answere to the doublet-maker. Wat Tiler answered him, friend appease thy selfe, thou shalt be well paid this day be ended, kéepe thée nére me, I wil be thy creditor: And therewith he spurred his horse, departed from his company, and came so nére the King that his horse head touched the crope of the Kings horse, and the first word he said was this, Sir King, séest thou all ponder people? yea truely quoth the King, wherefore saist thou so? because said he, they be all at my commaundment, and haue sworne to me faith and truth, to doe all that I will haue them.

maundement, will depart from thée thus, without hauing thy letters? no said the King, ye shall haue them, they be ordeyned for you, and shall be deliuered to euery each of them, with which words, Wat Tylar séeing the Knight Sir Iohn Newton nére to him on horsebacke, bearing the Kings sworde, was offended and said, it had become him better to be on fœte in his presence. The Knight (not hauing forgot his old accustomed manhood) answered, that it was no harme, séeing himselfe was also on horsebacke: which words so offended Wat, that he drew his dagger, and offered to strike at the Knight, calling him traytor: the Knight answered, that he lyed, and drew his dagger likewise. Wat Tylar not suffering such a contumely done to him before his ruffickes, made as if he would haue runne on the Knight. The King therefore séeing the Knight in danger, to allwage the rigor of Wat, for the time, commaunded the Knight to light on foote, and to deliuer his dagger vnto the said Walter, and when his proud minde could not so be pacified, but he would also haue his sword, the Knight answered, it was the Kings sword, and quoth he, thou art not worthy to haue it, nor thou durst aske it of me, if here were no more but thou and I. By my faith said Wat Tiler, I shall neuer eate till I haue thy head, and would haue run on the Knight: and with that came to the King, William Walworth, Maior of London, and many Knights and Esquires on the Kings side, affirming that it were great shame, such as had not béen heard of, if in their presence, they should permit a noble Knight so shamefully to be murdered before his face, wherefore he ought to be rescued spédily, and Tiler to be arrested. Which thing being heard, the King, although he were but tender of yéres, taking boldnesse vnto him, commaunded the Maior of London to set hand on him. The Maior being of an incomparable boldnesse and manhode, without any doubting, straight arrested him on ỹ head, Wat Tighler furiously strake the Maior with his dagger, but hurte him not by meane he was armed, then the Maior drew his baselard, and grieuously wounded Wat in the necke, and gaue him a great blow on the head, in which conflicte, an esquire of the Kings house, called Iohn Cauendish, drew his sworde and wounded him twise or thrise, euen vnto death, and Wat spurring his horse, cried to the commons to reuenge him, his horse bare him about foure score fote from thence where he fell downe halfe dead, and by and by they which attended on the King, inuironed him all about, whereby he was not séene of his company, and other thrust him in with their weapons in diuers places of his body, and then they drewe him from amongst the peoples fœte into the hospitall of Saint Bartilmewe: which when the commons perceiued, they cryed out that their Captaine was trayterously slaine, and hartening one another to reuenge his death, bending their bowes, the King, shewing both wisedome and courage, picking his horse with the spurs, rode to them, and said: What a work is this my men, what meane you to do, will you shote at your King? be not quarellous, nor sorry for the death of a traytor and ribald: I will be your King, I am your Captaine and leader, follow me into the field, there to haue whatsoeuer you will require.

Ouerlong it were in this booke to set downe the troubles at Saint Albons, by the bond men there against the Abbot, and other, for liberties which they claymed, as the like did in other places, committing many abominable acts, but somewhat to speake of them within the parts of Suffolke and Norfolke.

The Saterday wherof we haue before spoken, that the tempest might seeme to be generall, God sent his wrath into the partes of Suffolke and Northfolke, by sending Essex men to moue the people that liued in quietnesse, to raise like commotions, and to turne the hearts of the bondemen or seruants against their Lords. The which making to their Captaine a most ingratious priest named Iohn Wraw, who had bene at London the day before, and was instructed by Wat Tiler, easily assembled a multitude of those common people. These according to the manner of them at London, ouerthrew houses and manors of great men and of Lawyers, slew the Students of the Lawe, and catching Sir Iohn Cauendish a Iustice of the Realme, some say Lord chief iustice, beheaded him, and set his head on the pillory in the towne of Bury, Sir Iohn of Cambridge, Prior of Bury, they caught and strooke off his head, his body was left naked in the field the space of fiue dayes, none presuming to burie it, for feare of the Rustickes, his head was set on the pillory by the head of Sir Iohn Cauendish. John Litiſtar King of the commons, and ſerued by Knights.

Now the Commons ſent two Knights, Sir William de Morley, and Iohn Brewes with three of the Commons in whom they eſpecially truſted to the King at London, or els where, for to purchaſe of him a Charte manumiſſion and pardon, the which that it might be more ſpeciall then ot they deliuered vnto the ſaid meſſengers a great ſumme of money, which had receiued of the Citizens of Norwich vnder pretext to ſaue their citie burning and murder. heard of the Norfolke men, and determined to goe againſt them, he had at that time paſt an 8. ſpeares, and a ſmall number of archers, yet behol the Knights, and ſome of the Commons, he commaunded them vpon t allegeaunce to tel him, if there were any of the Kings traytors. The Kni for feare of the Commons, diſſembled to anſwere, the Biſhop willed t boldely to goe to, and if there were any of the Kings traytors, to del them to him: the Knights taking courage, anſwered that two of the ch ſtirrers among the whole company were preſent, and that the third gone forth to prouide their dinner, herewith they ſhewed the cauſe of t iourney. The Biſhop ſtraightwayes commanded theſe two to loſe their heads, and the third he himſelfe went to ſeeke, whoſe head alſo he cauſed to be cut off, & their heads were ſet vp at Newmarket. Then the Biſhop with the Knights haſte towards Norfolke, meaning to come to a place called Northwallham, where the Commons were determined to ſtay for the Kings anſwere.

In paſſing the countrey the Biſhops number increaſed, for diuers Knights and many gentlemen of the countrey that lay hid for feare of the Commons, ſeeing the Biſhop in armour, they ranne forth and ioyned with him. The Biſhop therefore when he came to the ſaid place, hauing about him a ſeemely company, he found that the Commons had entrenched themſelues after the manner of warre, and had ſet vpon the rampier of their trench, windowes, dores, tables, bordes, with pales for their defence: behind them, they had placed their carts, as if they meant not to flée, and forthwith the Martiall Biſhop commanded his trumpets to ſound and taking a ſpeare in his hand, ſet ſpurs to his horſe, and is caried forth vpon them with ſuch a courage, that with ſwift race he gate the trench of them, and as he had bin a foming bore rode amongſt his enemies where they were thickeſt, ſtriking this man through, and felling that man downe, and ceaſſed not till the company following hauing got the trench were ready to fight, thoſe of the Biſhops retinue therefore fought verie harpely, and ſo likewiſe did the Commons, till at length the Commons flée, but the Biſhop ſtopped them, knocking them downe, till the chiefe ſtirrers of the tumult being taken with their King Iohn Litiſtar, (ſo many as pleaſed him being ſaued aliue) he got the full victorie. The Biſhop brought the ſaid Iohn Litiſtar vnto drawing, hanging, and heading: and ſo the countrey was in peace. The end of Iohn Litiſtar.

Thus hauing ſhewed a few things which were done in Norfolke, I paſſe ouer to write of the reſt done in that and other countries, but what they ment againſt the King, the confeſſion of Iacke Straw declareth, who was chiefe amongſt them, next to Wat Tiler. This man being taken, when at London he ſhould by iudgement giuen by the Maior, loſe his head; the Maior ſpake openly to him thus. Iohn (quoth he) behold thy death is at hand without all doubt, and there is no way through which thou mayeſt hope to eſcape, wherefore for thy ſoules health, without making any lye, tell vs what you purpoſed amongſt you to haue done, to what ende did you aſſemble the Commons? And when he had ſtayde a while as doubtfull, what to ſay, deferring his anſwere, the Maior added, Thou knoweſt ſurely, O Iohn, that the thing which I demaunde of thée, if thou doe it, the ſame ſhall redeunde to thy ſoules health, &c. He therefore animated with fayre promiſes, beganne as followeth. Iacke Straw his confeſſion at the gallows to the Maior and others.

Now ſaith he, it boteth not to lye, neither is it lawful to vtter any vntruth, eſpecially vnderſtanding that my ſoule is to ſuffer more ſtrayter tormentes if I ſhould ſo doe, and becauſe I hope for two commodities by ſpeaking the truth, firſt that theſe things that I ſhall ſpeake may profite the common wealth: and ſecondly, after my death, I truſt by your ſuffrages to be ſuccored, Purpoſe of the Rebels.

according to your promises (which is to pray for me) I will speake faithfully without deceipt.

Conspiracy of the rebels.

The same time (sayeth he) that we came to Blacke Heath, when we for the King, we purposed to haue murdered al the knights, Esquires and tlemen that should haue come with him, and to haue ledde the King royal led, vp and downe, that with the sight of him, all men especially the com people might haue come vnto vs the more boldely, and when we had go gether an innumerable multitude, we would haue sodainely put to dea euery Countrey, the Lords and masters of the common people, in w might appeare to be either counsell or resistance against vs: and speciall would haue destroyed the Knights of Saint Iohns. lastly we would haue led the King himselfe, and all men that had bẽ of any possession, Bish Monkes, Chanons, Parsons, to be briefe, we would haue dispatched: ly begging Friers should haue liued, that might haue sufficed for minist the Sacraments in the whole Realme, for we should haue made Ki Wat Tyler in Kent, and in euery other shire one. But because this our pur was hindered by the Archbishop, we studied how to bring him shortly t ende.

Against the same day that Wat Tiler was killed, we purposed that eue (because that the poore people of London seemed to fauour vs) to set fi foure corners of the Citie, and so to haue burnt it, and to haue deuide riches at our pleasures amongst vs. He added that these things they purp to haue done, as God should helpe him at the end of his life.

Iacke Straw beheaded.

After this confession made, he was beheaded, and his head set on Lon Bridge by Wat Tilers and many other.

Principall Captaines.

The principall leaders of the Commons were Wat Tiler, the second I Strawe, the third Iohn Kirkby, the fourth Alen Threder, the fift Thomas Sc the sixth Ralph Rugge: these and many others were leaders of the Kentish Esser men. At Mildenhall and Bury in Suffolke, was Robert Westbr that made himselfe King, and was most famous after Iohn Wraw,, who b a priest would not set crowne vpon crowne, but left the name of King crowne to the said Robert. At Norwhich Iohn Litistar a dier, exercised name and power of a King, till he was taken and hanged for his paynes.

Wat Tiler being killed, Iacke Straw and other their principall Captai hanged or beaded, the hope and confidence of the Commons decayed, but cause the mindes of the King and nobles was yet wauering, seeing the pe ready to mischefe, they graunted to them Charters of manumission and fered them to depart, the which being done, the King caused an army to b sembled from London, and sent into all Countries that those who were friends should make haste to come to him to London, furnished with horse armour, and it came to passe that within three daies he had a xl. thousand m men about him in seemely sort armed, he mustred them on Blacke He himselfe ryding on a great courser, with his standard borne before him: w therefore so mighty an army was assembled, the King was aduertised that Kentish men had ettsones conspired, whereupon he forthwith set for wa but by the mediation of the Nobles and great men of Kent that vndertooke for them, he was stayde and pacified with them, and then first Iustices were sent to seeke and inquire of malefactours, and that Countrey became quiet at the sight of them. Then the Maior of London sitting in iudgement, caused the malefactors to be tried, as well of the Citie as also of Kent, Esser, Southser, Norffolke, and Suffolke and other Countries, that might be taken within the liberties of the Citie, and all those whom he found guiltie of the foresaid treason, he caused to hoppe headlesse, among the which were Iacke Strawe, Iohn Kirkeby, Alen Threder, &c. also Iohn Starling of Esser, that gloried to haue beheaded the Archbishop, was beheaded himselfe.

Maior of London caused malefactors of the Citie, of Kent, Esser, Suffer, Norfolke, & Suffolke that might be taken, to hoppe headles.

The king remained now at London, now at Waltham, with a great army of armed men, considering what was to be done for the commoditie of the Realme. At length the Counsell thought good to send the kings commission into euery Shire, for the resisting of the disquieters of the peace of the Kingdome. These commissions did much comfort the faithfull subiects, and troubled the false, for they were now compelled to seeke corners, that before tooke vpon them to doe all things abroade, Lawyers now durst come forth of their dennes, and those which before fled from the tyrannie of the time, looked for those that now feared iudgement and iustice to be done on them. An. reg. 5.

The commons being thus feared, but not in all places alike, they of Esser gathering a new multitude together at Byllerica, a village neere to Hatfield Peuerell, decreed either to inioy liberty gotten by force, or to dye in fighting for the same, they sent to the King then being at Waltham messengers to knowe if hee thought good to permit them to enioy their permitted libertie, like to their Lords, and that they should not be compelled to come to courts, but only to great Leets twise in the yeare, vnto the which the king answered thus. Oh miserable and hatefull both to land and sea, not worthie to liue: doe yee require to be equall to your Lords? Ye were worthie to be put to most shamefull death: but sith yee are come as messengers ye shall not die now, to the end yee may declare our answeres to your fellowes: declare to them therefore on the kings behalfe, that as they were husbandmen and bondmen, so shall they remaine in bondage, not as before, but more vile, without comparison farre, vnto this. Whilest we liue, and by Gods sufferance shall gouerne the kingdome, with witte, strength and goods, we will endeuour our selues to kéepe you vnder, so that the duety of your seruice, may be an example for posteritie, and that your matches both present, and that shall succéede, may euer haue before their eyes, as it were in a glasse, your miserie, and to you matter to curse, and feare to commit the like. When the messengers were gone, there was sent straight waies into Esser, Thomas of Woodstocke, Earle of Buckingham, and sir Thomas Percy brother to the earle of Northumberland, to represse the boldnesse of the said commons.

These commons had fortified themselues with ditches and carriages: neuertheles, although there was a great number of them, with small businesse they were scattered into the woods, where the Lords inclosed them, least any of them might escape: and it came to passe, that fiue hundred of thē were slaine.

and eight hundred of their horses taken, the other that escaped this slaughter being gotten together, hasted to Colchester, and began to stir the townesmen to a new tumult, and when they profited not there, they went to Sudbury, but the Lord Fitz Walter and sir Iohn Harlestone followed them, and slew as many of them as they list, and shut vp the rest in prisons. The King came to his mãnor of Hauering at Boure, and after to Chelmsford, where he appointed Sir Rob. Trisilian his Iustice to sit and enquire of the malefactours, wherfore the men seeing the euils that hung ouer their heads, there came aboue fiue hundred humbly to the King barefoted and bareheaded, beseeching him of pardon and mercie. To whom pardon was graunted, with condition, to deliuer the stirrers of the said trouble. It came therefore to passe, that many were committed to warde, vpon whom, the Iustice charged foure and twentie men of their conscience to say the truth, and many being condemned, were put to execution, by drawing and hanging, nine or tenne being hanged on one beame. The Iustices that before had sit in Essex, Kent, London, and other places, for all the multitude that were to be executed, vsed to head the Commons, till now it seemed not a kinde of death answerable to so many & manifest crimes. These things were done in Essex, the King being present: the like by his Iustices was done in other countries.

Robert Trisilian Iustice, sat at Chelmsford.

The tenth of July Iohn Ball priest being taken at Couentry, and brought to Saint Albons, was there before the King condemned, and had iudgement giuen him by Sir Robert Trisilian Knight a most skilful Iustice, as a traitour to be drawne, hanged, headed and bowelled, whose death was respited vntill the Monday at the intercession of William Bishop of London, who being carefull for his soules health, obtained that space for his repentance. This man a twentie yeares together and more, preached in diuers places those things which he knew to be liking to the common people, slaundering aswell ecclesiasticall persons, as secular Lords, seeking thereby, rather the beneuolence of the common people, then merite towards God: he taught that tithes were not to be giuen to the church men, except the partie that should giue the same were richer then the Vicar or parson that should receiue it. Also that tithes and oblations were to be withdrawen from Curates: if the parishioners or parishioner were of better life then the Curate. Also that no man was mete for the kingdome of God, that was not borne in matrimony, he taught many other things too long to rehearse, for the which he was prohibited of the Bishops in whose dioceses he had attempted these things, that he should not preach from thencefoorth in any Church: he went forth therefore into the stretes and wayes, and into fields to preach, & there wanted not of the commons that came to heare him, whom he euer sought to allure to his sermons, by detracting of the prelates. At the length being excommunicated, and yet not desisting, hee was committed to prison by Simon the Archbishop of Canterbury, and William Bishop of London, where he prophecied that he should be deliuered by twentie thousand of his friends, which came so to passe in the foresaid time of troubles, when all prisons were broken vp, and the prisoners driuen forth, and when hee was so deliuered, hee followed them, inciting ting them to committe much euill, and preaching that so it ought to be done. And that his doctrine might infect the more number of people, at Blacke heath, where there were many thousands of the Commons assembled, he began his Sermon in this manner:

When Adam dolue and Eue span, who was then a gentleman?

John Ball his Sermon.

And continuing his begunne Sermon, he sought by the worde of that prouerbe which he toke for his theame, to introduce, and prowe, that from the beginning, all were made a like by nature, and that bondage or seruitude was brought in by iniust oppression of naughty men, against the will of God: for if it had pleased God to haue made bondmen, he would haue appointed them from the beginning of the world, who should haue bēn slaue, and who Lord. They ought to consider therefore, that now there was a time giuen them by God, in the which, laying aside the yoke of continuall bondage, they might, if they would, enioy their long wished for libertie. Wherefore he admonished them, that they should be wise, and after the manner of a good husband that tilled his ground, and did cutte away all noysome wēdes that were accustomed to growe and oppresse the fruite, they should make haste to doe now at this present the like. First, the Archbishop and great men of the kingdome were to be slaine: after, Lawyers, Iusticiars, and Questmongers: lastly, whomsoeuer they knewe to be like heereafter hurtefull to the Commons, they should dispatch out of the land, for so might they purchase safety to themselues hereafter, if the great men being once taken away, there were among them equall libertie, all one nobilitie and like dignitie, and semblable authority or power. These, and many such mad deuises he preached, which made the common people to estēme of him in such manner, as they cryed out, he should be Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancellor of the Realme, for he onely deserued the honour. Moreouer, he had sent to the borders of the Commons in Essex a Letter full of riddles or darke sentences, exhorting them to procēde in their begun enterprises, which Letter was after found in the bouget of one that should be hanged, the tenour whereof was thus:

Libell of John Ball.

John Shepe, sometime Saint-Mary Priest of Yorke, and now of Colchester, gréeteth well Iohn namelesse, and Iohn Milner, and Iohn Carter, and biddeth them that they beware of Gillinbrough, and standeth together in Gods name, and biddeth Pierce Plowman goe to his worke, and chastice well Hob the robber, and take with him Iohn Trueman, and all his fellowes, and no moe, Iohn the Miller hath yground small small, the Kings sonne of heauen shall pay for all, beware or ye be woe, know your friend from your foe, haueth ynough, and saith hoe, and doe well and better, and flēth sinne, and sēketh peace, and holde therein, and so biddeth Iohn Trueman and all his fellowes.

This letter Iohn Ball confessed himselfe, that he had written and sent to the Commons: more, he confessed to William then Bishop of London, to Walter Lee Knight, and Iohn Perfoot Notarie, that a certain company of his sect, were confederate to go rounde about all England, and to preach these points which he had taught, naming I.W.N.A.L.B. masters of Artes. Whereupon he added, that except remedy were had, they within two yéres space would destroy the whole Realme, and this confession, vnder a certaine forme was brought into a publike instrument. This Sir Iohn Ball was hanged and headed at Saint Albons, on the 15. of July, the King being present, and his body being quartred, was sent to foure Cities of the Realme: some other Epistles of the said Ball haue I seene, which also I thinke good (as afore) here to insert.

Sir Iohn Ball hanged.

Epistle of Iohn Ball.

Iohn Ball Saint-Mary priest, greeteth well all manner of men, and bideth them in name of the Trinitie, Father Sonne, and holy Ghost, stand manlike together in truth, and helpe truth, and truth shall helpe you: now reigneth pride in price, couetise is holden wise, lechery without shame, gluttonie without blame, enuie raigneth with reason, and sloth is taken in great season, God do bote for now is time, Amen.

And clarkes for wealth wircheth them wo, God doe boote, for now is time.
I leaue out Iohn Carters Epistle, a libell, so named, &c.

A great number of the commons being indited, and hauing iudgement, at Saint Albons fiftéene of them were hanged, and foure score imprisoned, and afterward by pardon released, and on the twentieth day of July the King remoued to Berkhamsted.

Truce with the Scots.

Iohn Duke of Lancaster that a little before these troubles began, was gone Northward to be at the day of truce or march, as ỹ manner was euerie yére, when he heard of the hurling of the commons, in the time that they had the vpper hand ouer their Lords, he was marueilously amazed, and forecasting what might follow, thought it best, with spéde to make peace with the Scots, which was done before those tumults came to the eares of the Scots, and by them confirmed by oth for two yéares truce, that they would faithfully kéepe the same.

About the feaſt of All Saints, a Parliament was begun, which endured long, to ſmall purpoſe, by reaſon of contention among the Lords, eſpecially the Duke of Lancaſter, and the Earle of Northumberland, whoſe quarrel in the end was taken vp by the King, and then the Lords proceéded to treate of the Kings buſineſſe and the Realmes, but they lingered ſo long in vaine, that when ſome effect was thought ſhould haue ſucceéded, newes came of the comming to Caleys of the new Quéene. The King had made his choice before to haue this woman, and had bought her with a great price and much labor, for he gaue to the Emperour, x. thouſand pound, beſide other great expenſes, to make this mariage. After the feaſt of the Epiphany, alſo the Nobilitie of the Realme aſſembled at London, to be preſent at the Kings mariage, and to do their ſeruice according to the cuſtome of euery one in ancient time vſed. This Virgin named Anne, the daughter of Veſelaus King of Boheme, is at Weſtminſter conſecrated the Kings wife, & by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury is crowned Quéene. There were iuſtes kept for the honour of ſuch a ſolemnization, certaine dayes together, in which, both the Engliſhmen ſhewed their force, and the Quénes countrymen their proweſſe. 1382. The King married.

In this Quénes dayes, began the deteſtable vſe of piked ſhoes, tyed to their knées with chaines of ſiluer and gilt. Alſo noble women vſed high attire on their heads, piked like hornes, with long trained gownes, and rode on ſide ſaddles, after the example of the Quéne who firſt brought that faſhion into this land, for before, women were vſed to ride aſtride like men. The ſolemnity of the mariage being ended, the parliament is now begun againe, in which, many articles are propoſed and decréed, to wit, of admitting ſtrangers to ſell perſonally their wares, without impeachment of the merchants of England: of the abrogating of furres, and ſiluer garniſhing of girdles &c. of the price of wines, that is, that the tunne ſhould not exceéde ſire markes, &c. William Vfford Earle of Suffolke dyed ſuddainely.

Custome of woolles.

After his death the parliament was ended, after the marchants of England had granted to the King a subsidie, and the customes of woll for foure yeres next ensuing, which the Commons called le Maltot.

The Scots taking occasion of the time, for that a great number were gone ouer with the Bishop of Norwich, entred into Northumberland, & did much hurt to the inhabitants, taking praies in euery place, and leading away the people prisoners, and carrying them into Scotland: they toke the Castell of Warke vpon the riuer of Twede, and brent it.

An. reg. 7.

The Scots entred Northumberland.

About the feast of All-Saintes, a Parliament was holden at London, in which, the halfe of a fifténe was granted vnto the king by the Laytie, and shortly after the halfe of a tenth by the Cleargy, a portion of which money, the Lords of the North demaunded, because in this Parliament they were appointed to defend those parts against the irruptions of Scots, to whom answere was made by sir William Wikeham Bishop of Winchester, that they were made for that cause, of powre men, rich men and Lordes, that they might the more frankely kéepe the Scots, and that the king and Lords of the south parts should be the lesse troubled. And because the Scots came not to this Parliament, according to couenant, and beside that did displeasures vnto the inhabitants of the North parts, it was decréed by this Parliament, that vnto faith-breakers, faith shoulde be broken againe, and that a chosen power should bée sent thither, forth of England, vnder the leading of Thomas of Woodstocke, to wit, a thousand lances, and two thousand archers, to restraine their attempts.

Parliament at London.

Thomas of Woodstocke sent against the Scots.

These things being knowne, the Scots being afraid of themselues, in the ende of the Parliament came, and were desirous to intreat of peace or truce, but the Englishmen hauing tryed their falshod so oftentimes, would neither treat, nor compound with them, but commaunded them to returne home, and warned them to saue their heads as well as they might, and to defend their rights. The Scots being returned, the Lords of the North toke vpon them to defend the Countrey, till Thomas of Woodstocke, Earle of Buckingham were readie to come with a greater power.

In this Parliament the king toke the temporalties of the Bishop of Norwich into his hands, because he was disobedient to his commaundement when he sent to haue staied him from his iourney into Flaunders, and the knights that went ouer with him were put in prison, till they were redéemed with gold.

otherwise called Combartowne, that had bæn the yære before Maior of London, that with his seditions had filled the Citie ful of comber, attempted new troubles, for in contempt of the Maior that was elected for that yære, sir Nicholas Brembar, knight, he went vp and downe with a multitude of seditious people to guard him, not once, but oftentimes, to the terrour of many. And when the said Brembar Maior would haue withstanded his attempts, the fauourers of the said Iohn Combertowne were turned into such a fury, that a cobler sewer or shoomaker, toke vpon him as it were to be Maior, and required the voyces of the communalty: for which cause, by the counsaile of sir Robert Knowles knight, he was drawne out of his house, and committed to prison as a stirrer of insurrection, which act for that time stayde the commotion of the Commons, that were said to haue conspired to haue murthered the elect Maior, and many other worthy men.

John Duke of Lancaster went toward Scotland.

When Lent approached, Iohn Duke of Lancaster, with his brother Thomas of Woodstocke, Earle of Buckingham, and an innumerable number of Knights, Esquires, and Archers, went toward Scotland, but staid in the North vntill all the victualles in the Countrey were consumed: he did more hurt to the inhabitants, then the Scots had done before. At length, about the feast of Easter, he entred Scotland, but did little good.

Iohn Wiclif died.

This yære maister Iohn Wicliffe, sometime student in Canterbury College in the Vniuersitie of Oxford, parson of Lutterworth in Leicestershire, hauing bæne vexed with a palsey by the space of two yæres, died, on the last of December, and was buried at Lutterworth. This man whiles he liued, as also long after his death, was greatly fauoured by the students of that Vniuersity, as may appeare by letters testimonial, made more then twenty yæres after his decease, as followeth.

Letters testimoniall of the Vniuersitie of Oxford of the life of Iohn Wiclif.

To all children of our holy mother the Church, vnto whom these presents shall come, the Chancellor and company of masters of the Vniuersity of Oxford, sendeth greeting in our Lord euerlasting. For as much as it is not decent to ouerpasse with continuall silence, the acts of the valiant, nor the laudes and merits of the good, but that the same should be manifested to the world by true fame for a witnesse of it selfe, and example of others, for that also the prouident discretion of humane nature, weying mans cruelty, hath ordained this manner of remembrance, and this buckler of defence, against the blasphemous insulting of others, that when a testimony by word cannot alwaies be ready, a penne to write may supply: thereon it commeth to passe, that we hauing conceiued a speciall good minde, and tender care ouer the childe sometime of our Vniuersitie, Iohn Wicliffe professour of holy theologie, according to the deserts of his manners, do testifie with heart, word, and writing, that his conditions, while he liued, were commendable, whose honestie of manners, profunditie of iudgement, and pleasantnes of flourishing fame, we couet so much the more to bring to the knowledge of faithfull people, as the perfection of his conuersation, and his diligence of his writings might be the more euidently knowen to tend to Gods glory, the weale of his neighbour, and profit of the Church, wherfore we publish vnto you by these presents, that his conuersa-

tion from his tender yéeres continued, til the time of his decease, hath bin héere right good and honest, so as there was neuer any motion or note of sinister suspition or infamie cast abroad of him, but in answering, reading, preaching, and soluting, hath behaued himselfe praise worthily, like a stout Champion of the faith, vanquished by sentences of Scripture, like a Catholike man all those blasphemers of Christs religion by their wilful beggery. And therfore was not the foresaid Doctor condemned of hereticall prauitie, or yet by our Prelates to be burnt after his burial. God defend therefore that our Prelates should haue condemned so good a man for an heretike, which in Logike, Philosophy, in Theologie, in Moralities, and Speculatiues among all that hath written, (as we thinke) in our Vniuersitie, without péere. All which things we desire to bring to the knowledge of all and singular persons vnto whose hands these presents may come, to the intent that the said Doctors fame may the oftner be had in remembrance. In witnesse whereof, we haue caused these our letters testimoniall to be sealed with our common seale.

Giuen at Oxford in our congregation house the fifth day of the moneth of October. Anno. 1406.

All this notwithstanding afterward (being excommunicated by Thomas Arundale Archbishop of Canterbury) his bones, by a Doctor of Diuinitie of Oxford, named Richard Fleming Bishoppe of Lincolne, were taken vp and burnt, and the ashes throwen into the next water néere vnto Lutterworth 41. yéeres after his decease in Anno 1425. by commaundement of Pope Martine the fifth. Thus much for Wicliffe.

The custody of the castle of Douer being void by the death of Robert Ashton was then appointed to Simon Burley, who was made Constable there.

After the quindene of Easter the nobles came together to a Parliament at Salisbury, whither a certain Irish Frier of the order of Carmelites, a batcheler of Diuinity named Iohn Latimer, hasted in an euill houre, for he had written a certain scedul in the which was conteined many horrible practises deuised (as he said) by the duke of Lancaster, for it was in that scedul expressed, that the said duke had determined sodainly to oppresse the K. and to take vpon him the kingdom, there was assigned the time, place & other circumstances ỳ might make euident proofe of the thing. The Frier obtaining accesse vnto the K. presence, toke ỳ scedule to his own hands, swearing by the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, which that day he had receiued, that al written in that scedule was true. The duke therfore being called to the K. and hauing the scedul deliuered into his hands, desired the K. that the Frier might be put in safe kéeping, til the day ỳ he should shew the cause of those things which he had proponed against him, & besought the K. that sir Io. Holland might haue special charge of him. This Io. Holland, was the K. brother by his mother, the sonne of the L. Tho. Holland, who gladly for the loue of his brother the duke did willingly accept the frier into his custody. The night before the day giuen to the frier to make his answere, Ioh. Holland & another knight, called sir Henry Greene taking the Frier, put a cord about his necke, (some say about his armes) & with the same cord tying his cods, hanged him vp from the ground, laying a stone or

The morow after, they caused the friers body to be drawne through the towne as a traitor, that they might put away all suspition, that he were put to death wrongfully: but it is to be wondred at, that neither Esquier, Yeoman, nor Grome, or any other of meane estate, would harme the Frier, but the knights did it themselues, they were Iudges, Officers, and executioners, and this was the fruite of this Parliament, except that the king asked and had of the Laitie halfe a fiftenth, and of the Cleargie halfe a tenth.

About this time, because the Scots ceased not to do diuers domages to the Northumbers, the Earle of Northumberland Henry Percy, prepareth to inuade Scotland, and to requite domage for domage, which enterprise accomplished, the Earle was no sooner returned, and sent home his army, but that the Scottes came againe, and heaped vp domage vpon domage in the countrey.

Sir Iohn Philpot deceased.

This Sommer, sir Iohn Philpot a most faithfull knight, and noble Citizen of London, that had a long time trauelled for the commodity of the Realme more then all other, and both with expences laid forth, & good affection borne, (for he had oftentimes relieued the king) departed this life, leauing none behind him: his like in good affections.

Iohn Duke of Lancaster goeth into France.

About the beginning of August, the Duke of Lancaster went into France to treat with the Frenchmen of peace, or els of truce to be had: the Duke with his company of noble men remaining long there, when it was thought that hee should haue brought glad and ioyfull newes to his Country, hee returned with knowledge of warres, to follow the beginning of the next Sommer, the truce to endure but till the first of May, and so he returned, after he had spent 500000. Markes of siluer.

Iohn Northampton conuict, and committed to perpetuall prison.

Many of the Nobles assembled at Reading, to represse the seditious stirres of Iohn Northampton, late Maior of London, that attempted great and heinous enterprises, of the which he was conuict, his owne chaplein vttering many things that he went about and had deuised, as well to the hinderance and harme of the king, as of the Citie of London, and when sentence should haue beene pronounced against him, the king beeing present, the wicked man made exclamation, and maintained that such iudgement ought not to passe in absence of his Lord the Duke of Lancaster, but yet the iustice vsed such words, Iohn (saith hee) the naughty deeds that are obiected against thee, thou oughtest to refell by battell, or else by the lawes of the land to be drawne, hanged, and quartered. And when hee stood mute, nor would vtter one word, it was decreed that he should be committed to perpetuall prison, and his goods to be confiscate to the kings vse, and that hee should not come within one hundred miles of London during his life, hee was sent therefore to the Castle of Lintagell in the confines of Cornwal, and in the meane space the kings seruants spoyled his goods. Iohn More, Richard Northbery, & other, were likewise there conuict, and condemned to perpetuall prison, and their goods confiscate to the king, for certaine congregations by them made against the Fish-mongers in the Citie of London.

About the feast of S. Martine, a Parliament was holden at London in the which nothing was done worth ỹ memory, but that which stil was in hand, and exacting of money of the Clergy and common people, to maintaine the men of warre. And besides this, about the feast of Saint Andrew there was a combate fought in lists at Westminster, betwixt an Esquier of England named Iohn VVelch of Grimesby, & one of Nauarre, called Mortileto de Vilenos, that had accused the English Esquier, of treason to the King and Realme, but the effect was, that when hée was Captaine of Cherbrugh, hée forced the wife of this Nauaroys, as the said Nauaroys being afterward ouercome, and being ready to suffer death, did openly confesse, for the which cause, by the kings iudgement, he was drawen & hanged, although the Quéne and many other did make earnest intercession to haue his life saued.

Parliament at London.

A combate fought.

The Parliament was not yet ended, when newes came out of the North of the taking of Berwicke Castell by the Scots, the custodie whereof, the Earle of Northumberland, sir Henry Percy did possesse, by right of his predecessors. The Scots by mediation of money, got entrance into that castell, by one that was put in trust with képing of it. The Duke of Lancaster that loued not the Earle, was glad of this happe, when he knew it. It came to passe therfore by the Dukes procurement, that the Earle was condemned by iudgement of the Lords there present, the which execution was within a short while after released. The Earle of Northumberland, through the kings fauour restored to his life and possessions, without any long delaies, prepareth al furniture of warre to besiege and win the said Castell of them that were within it, and after he had gathered a mighty army, he sodainly besieged it, and after he had layne about it a certaine time, it was compounded betwixt them without, and them within, that they within should forsake the Castell, and haue their liues and moueable goods, and for surrendring the Castell, they should haue of the Earle two thousand markes of English money, and by this meanes did the Earle recouer the Castell forth of the Scottishmens hands. King Richard kept a solemn feast of Christmas at Eltham with Quéne Anne his wife, whom hée seldome suffred to go from his side, there were at that feast the Bohemians, the Quénes countrymen, that hauing once tasted the sweetnesse of this land, forgetting their owne countrey like vnshamefast guests, would not go home againe.

Through certaine young men brought vp with the king, there arose great dissention betwixt him and the Duke of Lancaster, who departed from the Court, and went to his Castell of Pomfret, which he had fortified, but by meanes of the kings mother, this discord was appeased for a time.

Sir Iohn de Vienne that ſerued the French King was ſent into Scotland with a great multitude of ſhips and men of warre, that ioyning with the Scots, they might infeſt all England, and that whileſt they might draw the power of this Realme that way forth, the French king, with his Nauy and armie, might the more at liberty enter other parts of the Realme, few or none being left at home to prohibite them their entrie. The arriuall of the ſaid Iohn being

In the moneth of Auguſt, the King of England with a mightie power entred Scotland, with whoſe force the Scots and Frenchmen perceiuing themſelues not able to match, they ſéeke to get them into the woods and places where they might be out of the way. The Engliſh armie, then the which there hath not beene ſeene a fairer, ſtronger, or greater, rideth through the Countrey, that was deſtitute of inhabitants, void of Cattell, and wanting victuals, for the land was left deſolate (as our men confeſſed) that they ſawe not ſo much as a bird, Owles onely excepted. They found green corne on the ground, very faire and plentifull, which they either eate vp with their horſes, or tread downe with their feete, but the enemies fleeing battell, our men did nothing to be accounted of, but burnt the Abbey of Melroyſis, and the towne of Edenborough, with ſuch houſes as they found by the way. The souldiers of Calais went secretly forth into Fraunce, and got a bootie of foure thousand sheepe, and three hundred head of great beasts, which they drew to their holdes.

About the feast of Saint Martine, there was a Parliament at London, in which, the Laytie granted to the king a fiftenth and a halfe, with a condition, that the Cleargie should giue a tenth and a halfe. William Courtney, Archbishop of Canterbury standing there-against, said, the Church ought to be free, and in no wise to be taxed by the laytie, yea, hee would rather put his head in daunger for this cause, then to suffer the English Church to be brought into such seruitude: which answeare so much moued the Knights and Commons of the shires, with some of the Nobles of the Realme, that they in great rage made request, that the temporalities might be taken from the Cleargie, and Church-men, saying, that the Church-men were growne to such pride, that it was a deede of charitie, and almes by taking away their temporalities, to compell them to be more meeke and humble: this they cried out for, this they presented in writing to the King, and such was their labour in this point, that they were in hope to bring it to passe. Here mought you haue seene the Knights pleasaunt and merry, talking of these things, euen as the temporalities of the Church had beene assigned to their abusing, this man promising himselfe thus much of that Monasterie, that man of an other, I heard my selfe (saith Thomas Walsingham) one of the Knightes deepely sweare, that of the Abbey of Saint Albones, hee would haue a thousand markes by yeere of the temporalities: But to such a mad wish the King consented not, for hearing the inordinate crying out of the one side, and the full answeares on the other, hee commaunded that bill to bee cancelled, and such inordinate petitions to cease, saying that hee would preserue the Church during his time, in as good state as hee found it, or better: with the which answeare, hee so liked the Church-men, that hee was thought worthie of great recompence, and of good Laye men also this answeare was much commended. The Archbishoppe therefore, hauing made the Cleargie priuie, went to the King, and declared that hee and his Cleargie of their whole consentes and free willes had prouided for his vse a Tenth, which graunt the King so gladly heard, and thankefully receiued, that hee openly affirmed, hee had rather haue this free graunt, then any other foure times double the value, that was to bee constrayned, and so for that time the insatiable couetousnesse of the enemies, to catch other mens goodes, was made frustrate. Bill put against the Cleargy for their temporalities.

The eleuenth of November, Robert Vere, Earle of Oxford, was made Marquesse of Dyuelin in Ireland, and the king gaue him lands to the value of a thousand markes by yeere, that belonged the Lord Audley; he also made him Marques of Diuelin in Ireland.

Lord Iustice of Chester, he gaue to him the Castell of Flint in Wales, and also he gaue to him I. of Britons sonne and heire to Charles de Bloys a prisoner, for whom he had 20000. pounds. Th. of Woodstocke was made D. of Glocester, and his brother Edmond Earle of Cambridge, Duke of Yorke, Michael de la Poole Chancellor of England, was made Earle of Suffolke, and had giuen him by the king a thousand markes by the yéere. In the Parliament the Earle of March Mortimer, was proclaimed heire apparant to the Crowne, which Earle was shortly after slain in Ireland by the wilde Irish. Also, king Richard at the earnest request of the Bishops, restored to the Bishop of Norwich his temporalties which he had holden from him many yéeres. K. Richard with Quéene Anne his wife, kept their Christmas at Eltham, whither came to him Lion king of Ermony, vnder pretence to reforme peace betwixt the kings of England and of Fraunce, but what his comming profited, he onely vnderstood, for beside innumerable giftes that hée receiued of the king & of the nobles, the king lying in the Royal at the Quéenes wardrop in London, granted to him a Charter of a thousand pounds by yéere during his life. Hée was (as hée affirmed) chased out of his Realme by the Tartarians, and for that cause he got great giftes of the Christian Princes. About the feast of Easter, Iohn Duke of Lancaster, with the Ladie Constance his wife and a great company of Knights, Esquiers, and Archers came to take their leaue of the King and Quéene, at whose departing the King gaue to the Duke a crowne of gold, and the Quéene gaue another like crowne of golde to the Dutches, moreouer the King commaunded his people to call them King and Quéene of Spayne, and giue them kingly honour. And shortly after the Duke prepareth to go into Spayne, which was due to him by the inheritable right of his wife the Ladie Constance, daughter sometime to Peter King of Castile and Lion, so that now he meant to chalenge it eyther with consent of the inhabitantes, or by law of Armes. Hée with a great power toke the seas at Plimmouth, and landed in Spayne, at the Hauen of Groyne, on the éeuen of S. Laurence, with all his Nauie in safety.

This yéere rumours were raised of the French kings purpose to besiege Caleis, many valiant men therefore were sent out of England to resist his force, among whom was sir Henry Percy, a young Gentleman, in whom the prowse of all prowesse and chiualry did shine, which after hé had stayed about Caleis solely taking indignation, declared that hé hated such idlenesse, and before this, whilest he was Captaine of Berwicke, hé compelled the vnquiet Scots to be quiet, for which cause they called him Henry Hotespurre: this Henry assembling his companions, marketh inuasion vpon them about

Ladislaus IV. call'd Jagellon K. of Poland

About the feast of S. Michaell the nobles came to the Parliament at London with great numbers of armed men, to the end they might be ready to withstand the Frenchmen, who were supposed to be comming. Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, and Chancellor of England, caused to be called almost forth of euery part of the Realme men of armes and archers vnto the marches about London, that being ready they might beate backe the Frenchmen with their king, if they had come. Rochester bridge was beaten downe by the Londoners, to be the more surer. But being wearied with long waiting they were at the length sent home againe, with great misery for want of money to buy them victuals.

In this Parliament Iohn Fordham Bishop of Durham was discharged of the Treasurership, and in his place was set Iohn Gilbert a Frier preacher, Bishop of Hereford. Also Michaell de la Pole was put from his Chancellorship, and in his place was set Thomas Arundale Bishop of Ely, by consent of the whole Parliament. This being done, Michaell de la Pole was charged with many crimes, & committed to prison in Windsore Castell, from whence hee was sone deliuered by the king: all the possessions of de la Pole purchased whilest he was Chancellor to the yeerly value of 1000. pounds, were for euer by iudgement of the parliament, confiscate to the kings coffers, & further to restore to the king to the value of 12000. pounds which he had gained by lingering his affairs, as they said. They chose also 13. Lords which should haue the ouersight vnder the K. of the whole realm. Of which three were the new officers, to wit, the B. of Ely Chancellor, the Bishop of Hereford Treasurer, and sir Iohn Waltham keeper of the priuy seale, and 10. other which were, VVilliam Archbishop of Canterbury, Alexander Archbishop of Yorke, Edm. The French kings comming into England hindered.

The French king in the meane time, laid in Flanders, readie to spoyle the Realme of England, if God had not stopped his purpose; from the first of August, till the Euen of All-Saints, there neuer blew wind for his passage, but onely for a fewe houres of that verie Euen, the wind rising, they losed anchors, hoysed vp sailes, and set forth of the hauen, but when all the ships were on the sea 20. miles from the hauen, the winde came contrary, droue them backe, that diuers of their vessels entring the hauen of Sluce were broken, by which occasion England was deliuered out of daunger, and the French king returned home. The number of his ships in that Nauy were reckoned 1200. Froisart saith, the ships were 1287. he had there with him of Dukes, 16. of Earles, 26. of Knights, 3600. and of fighting men, 100000. K. Richard with his wife Quéene Anne and the Bohemians as he had béene accustomed, kept his Christmas very solemnly at Westminster.

1387. After Christmas, William Beauchampe toke 14. ships of the French king, going toward Sluce, whereof one was laden for the most part with horses, and an other with torches of ware, and such other necessaries, which the French king had prepared for his entrance into England.

Barley solde for viii. d. the quarter.

In the beginning of this yéere, at Leicester an hundred quarters of Barley, were sold for an hundred shillings.

About the beginning of March, according to the decrée of the late Parliament, Richard Earle of Arundell, Admirall of the fléete adioyning vnto him, the E. of Deuonshire, & Thomas Mowbrey E. of Nottingham, went to the sea in a happy houre, for within a small time they met with their enemies on the Vigill of our Lady the Annunciation; a great Nauy of Flanders, France, and Spayne, fraught with men of warre, and diuers engins, was discouered; with whom the Earles encountred, & toke of them 100. ships and more, the which contained xix. M. tuns of wine, which they brought to diuers parts of England, whereby wine was then sold for thirtéen shillings foure pence the tunne.

Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland forsoke his wife, a yong Lady noble and faire, borne of the Lady Isabell, daughter to the noble K. Edward, & maried an other that came with Quéene Anne forth of Boheme: she was called in the vulgar tongue of her countrey Lancecrona. The Lordes toke indignation herewith, especially the Duke of Gloucester, vncle to the yong Lady that was forsaken. The Duke of Ireland studied how to take the Duke of Gloucester out of the way. Easter was now past, the time in which the Duke of Ireland should haue transported into Ireland, but least there should be too much stur in the Realme among the Lords, the king as it were to bring him to the water side, goeth with him into Wales, as not to leaue him, but there to keepe him, that they might deuise how to take away the D. of Gloucester, the Earles of Arundell, Warwike, Darby, and Nottingham, with other. There were with them the Earle of Suffolk, Michael at Pole, Robert Trisilian Iustice, and many other, which no more slowly then the D. of Ireland, conspired the death of of the said noble men. After a great time was passed, the king, as if the Duke of Irelands iourney had béene forgotten, returned with him and the other forth of Wales, to the Castell of Nottingham, there to treat of the death of the said noble men: there therfore he sent for diuers from London, whom he knew would be ready to which way soeuer they should be moued: he called thither also al ỹ Sheriffs & Iustices of the realme, & there interdicted the Lords of many crimes which the king had imagined against them. In the mean time the rumour of this doing came to the Lords eares, whereupon first of all the kings vncle, the Duke of Glocester, that he might mitigate the kings displeasure, before the Bishop of London, and many other nobles, swearing vpon the Euangelists, toke it vpon his oath, that he neuer had imagined any thing to the kings hinderance, or done any thing to his displeasure, except that he had not giuen good countenance to the Duke of Ireland, nor would hereafter giue him any, who had dishonested his kinswoman, the which he firmely had determined to reuenge. An. reg. 11.

The Duke of Glocester calling together secretly the Earles of Arundell, Warwike, and Darby, that were in like danger of condemnation, if they prouided not the more spédily, he discouered to them the matter: they therefore gathered their armies together, determine to talke with the king vpon the premises. Contrarily the king for his party did deliberate how he might take each of them by themselues out of the way, and first he sent to the Castell of Rigate, where the Earle of Arundell lay, the Earle of Northumberland with many other to arrest him, who perceiuing a great number of men of warre about him, fearing to doe that he was commaunded, departed without doing his errand for which he came. After whom, there were sent many that by night should haue taken him, or haue slaine him, but a messenger sent from the Duke of Glocester, preuented their comming, that caused him to ride all night, so that in the morning he was come to Haringey, hauing passed with his army thirtie miles, not without great trauaile, where he found assembled the Duke of Glocester & the Earle of Warwike, with a great power of men. The king being enformed of this assembly in Harnesey woode, as is said, demaunded of his familiars what was to be done in this case, but in the ende, by the mediation of them that came betwirt them, the matter was brought to this issue, that the Lords should come to Westminster to receiue answere before the king of those things, the bishop of Ely, with many other men of worthy credite, taking an oth for the kings part, that no fraud, deceit, or perill, should be prepared. When the Lords had prepared themselues according to the couenant, the forsaid mediators for peace sent them word, that treason was deuised by an ambush laid for them, in a place called the Mewes, nére to Charing Crosse, and therfore willed them not to come, but with sure hand, whereupon they stayed there: and the king demaunding why the Lords kept not couenant, the Bishop of Ely answered, because (saith he) there is an ambush laid of a thousand armed men or more, in such a place, contrary to the couenant, and therefore they neither come, nor repute you to be faithfull: the king moued forthwith, sware he knew of no such thing, and therefore commaunded the sheriffes of London, that going to the Stewes, they should kill, if they found any assembled there for that cause; but Thomas Triuet, and Nicholas Brembar knights, had secretly sent away the armed men to London: the king therfore sent again to the Lords, who straightwaies came to Westminster with a strong power, against whose comming, the king adorning himselfe with kingly robes, with crowne and scepter, entreth Westminster hall, where the Bishop of Ely Lord Chancellor, speaking for the king, demanded the cause of their assembling of such a power, wherunto the Lords answered, that it was done for the kings profit, and the realmes, to plucke from him the traitors which he kept about him, whom they named to be Robert de Vere D. of Ireland, Alexander Nevell Archbishop of Yorke, Michaell at Pole Earle of Suffolke, Robert Trisilian a false Justice, Nicholas Brembar a false knight of London, and thereupon they threw downe their gloues, swearing that they would prosecute it by battell: nay, saith the king, it shall not be so, but in the nert parliament which was appointed to be holden the morrow after the purification of our Ladie, all this was pacified for that time.

Strange likenesse of fire. Henry of Leicester.

A manner of exhalation in likenesse of fire, appeared in the night in many places of England, which went with men as they went, and stayed as they did, sometime like a wheele, sometime like a barrell, sometime like a timberlogge, but when many went together, it appeared to be farre off.

The Lords departing from the king notwithstanding kept together, which séemed great wisedome in them, for the Duke of Ireland in the parts of Chester & Wales, had assembled a great number, whose Captaine was the Constable of Chester, Thomas Moleneux, a man of great wealth, and hardy. The Duke of Ireland with such a multitude hasted towards London, that ioining with the Londoners, he might make them both as it were an inuincible army. But the Duke of Ireland riding forth in stately and glorious array with the army of 5000. men, thinking none durst haue encountred him: Neuertheless in the vigill of S. Thomas the Apostle, when he came to Radcote bridge in Oxfordshire nére vnto Farendon vpon Thamis, not past foure miles from Cheping Norton, which bridge, if he could haue passed, he had béene out of danger, sodainly, as he looked on the one side, he beheld where the host of the Lords was ready not farre from them tarrying his comming, in the midst of the valley, with which sight his heart straight waies failed: and he said, friends I must fly, for a greater puissance séemeth to be yonder, against you they haue no quarrell, so that I being shifted away, ye shal escape wel ynough, and forth with setting spurres to his horse, he fléeth away. There was then the foresaid Thomas Moleneux that prepared himselfe to the battell, for the Lordes were not yet all come to that place, who when he had fought a while, being wearied, entred the riuer which was there by. Among other, sir Thomas Mortimer knight exhorted him to come vp, or else he would shote him through in the riuer: if I doe come vp saith Thomas Moleneux, wilt thou saue my life? I doe make no such promise (saith hée) but eyther come vp, or thou shalt straight die for it. To whom he answered, suffer me to come vp and let mée fight eyther with thée or some other, and die like a man. As hée came vp, the knight caught him by the helmet, and plucked it off his head, and straightwaies with his dagger strucke him into the braines.

The Duke of Ireland fléeing, came to the riuer of Thamis, and forced his horse to enter, in the which being made of an horseman a swimmer, he got to the other side: his horse, helmet, gantlets and breast-plate came to the share of the Lords, so that he was thought long after to be drowned, but he got ouer into Flaunders.

The Archbishop of Yorke fled, and Robert Trisilian, and Michael de la Poole got him to Caleis. The Lords being returned from the battell, which had béene néere to Burford, fast by Bablack, made great toy for the ouerthrow of their enemies, but much lamented the escape of the Duke of Ireland. Archbishop of Yorke fled the Realme.

A head of earth was made at Orford by Art of Necromancie, that at a time appointed spake these words, Caput decidetur, The head shall be cut off: Caput eleuabitur, The head shall be lift vp: Pedes eleuabuntur supra caput, The feete shall be lift aboue the head.

Dissension fell at Orford betwéene the Southerne and Welchmen on the one part, and Northerne Schollers on the other, where-through many were slaine, and the more part went to their countries, wherefore the Chancellor was depriued, and Doctor Nicholas Brightwell Deane of Newarke in Leicester was made Chancellor. Dissention at Orford betweene the Southerne & Northren Schollers.

The Lords hasted to London, where the king kept his Christmasse in the Tower of London, they hauing assembled an armie of néere hand fortie thousand the morrow after Christmasse day came to London, and mustred in the fieldes, where they might be séene of them in the Tower: the Londoners were then in great feare, weying diuers perilles as the kings displeasure, if they opened their gates to the Lords, and if they shut them forth, the indignation of the vndiscréete multitude. 1388. The Lords came to London.

The Duke of Glocester with other entred the Tower, and hauing a little talke with the king, they recited the conspiracie, whereby they had béene indited, and they shewed forth also the letters, which he had sent vnto the Duke of Ireland, that he should assemble an armie to their destruction, &c. in the end the king promised on the next morow to come to Westminster, and there to intreat at large for reformation of all matters. The Lords come to the K. being then in the Tower of London. The K. commeth to Westminster.

In the morning the king came to Westminster, where, after a little talke, the nobles said that for his honour and commoditie of his kingdome it was behouefull, that the traitors, whisperers, flatterers, and vnprofitable people were remoued out of place, and that others might bée placed in their rowmes.

The king, although sore against his mind, when he saw how ý Lords were bent, and that hée wanted power to withstand them, condescended to do what they would haue him, & to conclude, the king at the request of the Lords commaunded the suspected persons of his court, & family to be awarded to prison, to answere at the next Parliament, which persons were sir Simon Burghley, sir William Elmham, sir Nicholas Dagworth, sir Iohn Golefare, which was not yet returned out of Fraunce, all these being knights, Richard Clifford, and a Priest Sir Simon Burghley and many other committed to prison.

Prieſt called Nicholas Slake Deane of the kings Chappell were appointed to Nottingham Caſtel. To the Caſtell of Douer were appointed ſir Iohn Beauchampe of Holt Steward of the kings houſe, ſir Thomas Triuet, ſir Iohn Saliſburie, and Iohn Loncolne. To the Caſtell of Briſtow Iames Berners, and Richard Medford Clearke. To the Caſtell of Rocheſter was appointed Alexander Neuell Archbiſhop of Yorke, but he was eſcaped as ye haue heard, and Michaell de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, which was fled. To the Caſtell of Gloceſter were deputed Robert Triſilian chiefe Iuſtice of England, which was not yet found, and Nicholas Brembar, who found ſureties to ſtand to the lawes of the Realme.

Many perſons remoued out of the kings Court.

Theſe were remoued alſo from the Court, but not ſent to priſon, Iohn Fordham Biſhop of Durham, the Lord Beamont, Lord William de la Souch of Harneworth, the Lord Burnell, ſir Iohn Louell, the Lord Thomas Camoys, Thomas the ſonne of the Lord Clifford, with Baldwin Burforde, Thomas Ruſſhoke a Frier, Biſhoppe of Chicheſter the kings Confeſſour, Aubery de Vere, Richard Aberbery, Iohn VVorth, the Ladie Maine, the Ladie Poines, and the Ladie Molineaux, all which were to anſweare at the next Parliament.

Parliament that wrought wonders.

The third day of Februarie, the Parliament began at Weſtminſter, which Parliament continued till the 13. of Iune nert following, except from the Vigill of Palme ſonday vntill the Octaues of Eaſter, this Parliament was named the Parliament that wrought wonders. The Lords came to this Parliament with a ſufficient army for their owne ſureties. The firſt day of this Parliament were arreſted as they ſate in their places, all the Iuſtices, except ſir VVilliam Skipwith, and ſir Roger Fulthorpe, ſir Robert Belknape, ſir Iohn Carey, ſir Iohn Holte, ſir VVilliam Borow, and Iohn Aleſton the kinges Serieant at Lawe, all theſe were ſent to the Tower, and there kept in ſeuerall places.

The Iuſtices arreſted as they ſate in Parliament.

The cauſe was, for that where in the laſt Parliament diuers Lords were made gouernours of the Realme, both by aſſent of the Parliament, and alſo by the aduice and counſel of all the Iuſtices, and yet notwithſtanding, the ſaid Iuſtices in a counſel holden at Nottingham, did the contrary, whereupon it was now determined that they ſhould make anſwere to their doings. Moreouer, in the beginning of this Parliament were openly called, Robert Vere Duke of Ireland, Alexander Neuel Archbiſhop of Yorke, Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolk, ſir Robert Triſilian Lord chiefe Iuſtice of England, & Nicholas Brembar, whom the king had oft times made Maior of London againſt the minde of the Citizens, to anſwere before Thomas of Woodſtocke Duke of Gloceſter, Richard Earle of Arundell, Thomas Beauchampe Earle of Warwicke, Henry Earle of Darby, & Thomas Earle of Nottingham, vpon certain articles of high treaſon, which theſe Lords did charge them with: and for aſmuch as none thē appeared, it was ordained by the whole aſſent of the Parliament, that they ſhould be baniſhed for euer, and their lands and goods to be forfeited and ſeized into the kings hands, their landes entailed excepted, which ſhould deſcend to their heires. compyled in eight and thirtie articles, I ouerpasse in this place, and haue set them downe in my larger Chronicle.

The foresaid Lords being fled as is aforesaid, Robert Trisilian a Cornish man, Lord chiefe Iustice to the King, had hid himself in an Apothecaries house in the Sanctuary neere to the gate of Westminster, where he might see the Lords going to the Parliament, and comming forth thereby to learne what was done, for all his life time he did al things closely, but now his craft being espied was turned to great folly. For on Wednesday the seuentéenth of February he was betraied of his owne seruant, & about eleuen of the clocke before noone, being taken by the Duke of Gloucester, and in the Parliament presented, so that the same day in the after noone hée was drawen to Tyborne from the Tower of London through the Citie, and there had his throat cut, and his bodie was buried in the gray Friers Church at London. This man had disfigured himselfe, as if he had béene a poore weake man, in a frize coat, all old and torne, and had artificially made himselfe a long beard, such as they called a Paris beard, and had defiled his face, to the end he might not be knowen but by his speach. On the morrow, was executed sir Nicholas Brembar, who had done many oppressions, and caused seditions in the Citie, of whom it was said, that whilest he was in full authoritie of Maioralitie, he caused a common payre of Stocks in euery ward, and a common Are to be made to behead all such as should be against him, and it was further said, that hée had indited 8000. and more of the best and greatest of the Citie, but it was said that the said Nicholas was beheaded with the same Are he had prepared for other: this man if hée had liued, had béene created Duke of Troy, or of London by the name of Troy.

Sir Nicholas Brembar executed.

On the fourth of March Thomas Vske, Vndersheriue of London, and Iohn Blake Esquire, one of the kings household, were drawne from the Tower to Tyborne and there hanged and beheaded, the head of Thomas Vske was set by ouer Newgate, to the opprobry of his parents, which inhabited thereby. The goods of the Bishop of Chichester were confiscate, and on the eleuenth of March the Parliament was prorogued vnto the quinden of Pasch.

The fift day of May sir Simon Burghley Constable of Douer, and Chamberlaine to the King, an intollerable proud man and a great oppressor of the poore, &c. was condemned of treason, but the King dispensed for his drawing and hanging, so that he was with his hands bound behinde him led through the Citie of London, and had his head stricken off vpon the Tower hill on the fiftéenth day of May, his heires were by Henry the fourth restored in blod and inheritance, except the landes giuen to the new Abbey on the Tower hill, to S. Stephens at Westminster, and to the Friers at Langley. This man might by inheritance dispend twentie markes by yéere, but in few yéeres he so grew in seruice of the king, that he attained to the value of 3000. markes of yérely reuenues, of whom it was said that he gaue at Christmasse for liueries of Knights and Esquires, yeomen and others as well of the kings court as of his owne family, sometime fortie clothes, sometime 160. clothes, and sometime 220. of great price, as of Scarlet, &c.

Simon Burghley beheaded.

Also on the twelfth of May Iohn Beauchampe of Holt Lord Steward of the kings house, whom the king had thought to haue made Baron of Bridgenorth, was condemned to be drawne, and hanged, but by the kings fauour, he lost his head on the Tower hill.

Sir Iohn Bernes knight of the kings Court, a lustie young man, was in the same place beheaded. Sir Iohn Salisburie knight was drawne from the Tower to Tiborne, and there hanged.

There were condemned also in the same Parliament these Iustices, sir Ro. Belknape, sir Iohn Carre, sir Iohn Holte, sir Roger Fulthorpe, and sir VVilliam Brough, Iohn Locton Serieant at the Lawe, Richard Gray Iustices, with the Lords before fled, were all banished.

Subsidy of wool.

There was granted to the king, of the Cleargie halfe a tenth, and of the Laity halfe a fiftenth, and of the merchants twelue pence of the pound, three shillings of the tunne, three and fifty shillings foure pence of the sacke of wol.

The Duke of Glocester, and sir Iohn Cobham, asked pardon of the Abbot of Westminster for violence done in the sanctuarie of Westminster, in the taking of the Iustice Trisilian. The last saue one of May there were deliuered out of the Tower VV. Elmham, T. Triuet, and Nicholas Dagworth knightes. Also the first of June, Iohn Holland the kings brother was created Earle of Huntington.

King Richard renewed the oth which he had taken at his coronation.

The third day of June, the king in the Church of Westminster renued the oath, which he toke when he was crowned, and all the Lords sware homage and fealtie to him, and all the Bishops did excommunicate all those that would goe about to hinder the Statutes of this last Parliament, or the great Charter.

After Whitsontide Richard Earle of Arundale, with a company of valiant men went to the sea, and fought with certaine ships of his enemies, taking, An. reg. 12. drowning, or burning foure score ships, he entred into the Ile of Beas, which he spoyled and brent.

The Scots inuade the North parts of England.

The same yeare the Scots prepared themselues that as soone as the truce was expired they might be readie to inuade the North parts, and with a great army entred England, committing great slaughters of people and toke bowties in euery place, and led away many prisoners, and burned Townes, and approched to Newcastell vpon Tine, and pight their tentes not farre from thence. There was then in the same towne sir Henry Percy the younger, and sir Ralph his brother, both desirous of warlike renowme, and sore enemies vnto the Scots. This sir Henry came vpon thē on the sodain, & assailed them in the campe, making great slaughter of them. VVilliam or Iames Dowglas, after Froisart, also chiefe Captaine of the Scottes, beholding the thing that a thousand times he had wished, that is, sir Henry Percy within his campe, rideth against him, but was slaine by the saide Henry; then commeth the Earle of Dunbarre with an excessiue number of Scottes, & toke the saide Henry with his brother Ralph, slaying many Englishmen to the number of 1100. in that place, at the which time there were in number 30000. put to flight, and toke the water at Otterborne: but yet the Scottes lost should not chuse nor haue any Maior, but that the King should appoint one of his Knights to be ruler of the Citie: their priuiledges were reuoked, their liberties disanulled, and their lawes abrogated.

The King then on the one and twentieth of June first appointed to be Warden of the Citie a certaine Knight called Sir Edward de Dalingrige, but he was quickely deposed by the King, because men said he fauoured the Londoners, and Baldwin Radinton was constituted in his place. An. reg. 16.

In the meane time, through suite of certaine Knights, but specially of the Duke of Glocester, the King is somewhat pacified, and by little and little abateth the rigour of his purpose, calling to minde the diuers honours, and the great giftes he had receiued of the Londoners, whereupon he determineth to deale more mildely with them, and to call them to some hope of grace and pardon, he sendeth commandement to them to come to Windsor, there to shewe their priuiledges, liberties and lawes, which being there shewed some of them were ratified and some condemned, but they could not obtaine the Kings full fauour, till they had satisfied the King for the iniuries which was said they had done. The King at this assembly at Windsore, had got together almost all the Lords, and so great an armie, that the Londoners had cause to be afraid thereof, about the which preparation he was at great charges, for the which it was sure that the Londoners must pay. They therefore not ignorant that the end of these things was a money matter, submitted themselues to the Kings pleasure, offering tenne thousand pound. They were yet dismissed home to returne againe, vncertaine what satisfaction and summe they should pay. The Londoners called before the King at Windsor.

When the Citizens were returned, and that the Nobles and other were gone home: the King hearing that the Londoners were in heauines, and disquieted, he said to his men, I will goe (saith he) to London, and comfort the Citizens, and will not that they any longer despaire of my fauour, which sentence was no sooner knowen in the Citie but all men were filled with incredible ioy, so that euery of them generally determined to méete him, and to be as liberall in gifts, as they were at his coronation. The King therefore as he came from Shine in Surrey to London, with Quéene Anne his wife, on the 29. of August, the principall Citizens all in one liuery to the number of 400. horsemen rode to méete them at Maudswoth, where in most lowly wise, they submitted themselues vnto his grace, beséeching him of his speciall pardon, in all such things, as they before had offended him, and the Recorder of the Citie, in the name of the whole Citizens, instantly required him, that he would of his great bounty take such paine vpon him as to ride through his Chamber of London, to the which request he graciously consented, so he held on his iourney til he came to S. Georges Church in Southwarke, where they were receiued with procession of Robert Braybroke Bishop of London, and all the Clergie of the Citie, who conueyed them through London, the Citizens of London, men, women and children in order méeting the King at London Bridge, where he was by them presented with two faire white steedes, trapped in cloth of golde, parted of red and white, hanged full of siluer belles, the The King riding towards London, receiued by the Citizens.

which present he thankfully receiued, and after he held on his way through the Citie toward Westminster.

And as they passed the Citie the stréetes were hanged with cloth of golde, siluer and silke. The Conduite in Chepe ran with red and white Wine, and by a childe Angel-like he was presented with a very costly crowne of golde, and the Quéene with another. A table of the Trinitie in golde was giuen to the king, valued worth eight hundred pound, and another to the Quéene of S. Anne, because her name was Anne, with diuers other gifts, as horses, trappers, plate of gold and siluer, clothes of gold, silke, veluets, Basons & Ewers of golde, also golde in coyne, precious stones, and iewels, so rich, excellent, and beautifull, that the value and price might not wel be estéemed, and so the Citizens recouered their ancient customes and liberties, & then the kings Bench from Yorke, and the Chancery from Nottingham, was returned to London. And it was graunted to them that they might chose them a Maior as before time they had done. The Londoners beléeued that by these gifts they had escaped all daunger, and that from thencefoorth they should be quiet, but they were deceiued, for they were compelled to giue the King after this 10000. pound, collected of the commons in great bitternesse of minde; for the which summe, the King became benenolent to the Citizens, and forgaue them all trespasses, by his patents dated at Westminster the 28. of February, and so the troubles of the Citizens came to quietnesse; which trouble the Dolphin in Thamis at Christmasse last past did happily signifie a farre off. A fabulous booke compiled by a nameless author, but printed by William Caxton (and therefore called Caxtons Chronicle) reporteth these troubles to happen through a fray in Flétestréte, about an horse loafe which was taken out of a Bakers basket, by a Yeoman of the Bishop of Salisburies, and that the same troubles were pacified, and their liberties were againe restored by meanes of Richard Grauesend Bishop of London, in reward whereof the Citizens repaire to the place of burial in the middle Ile of S. Pauls church, &c. But al ý is vntrue, for at this time Robert Braybroke was Bishop of London, and Richard Grauesend had béen Bishop, and deceased in the time of Edward the first, in Anno 1303, almost 90. yéeres before this time. After whom succéeded in the Bishoprieke Ralph Baldoke, Gilbert Segraue, Richard Newport, Steuen Grauesend, Richard Wentworth, Ralph Stratford, Michael Norbroke, Simon Sudbury, William Courtney, and Robert Braybrooke that sate Bishop of London from 1381. vntill the yéere 1403.

A great fable reproued.

Moreouer the place of burial in S. Pauls, whereunto the Maior and Citizens of London haue repayred, is of William, who was Bishop of London in the time of William Conquerour, who purchased the first Charter of the said King William, for the same Citie, as I haue before declared.

Robert de Vere Earle of Orford dyes in great mysérie beyond sea.

Robert de Vere, sometime Earle of Orford, that by many degrées had mounted to the name of Duke of Ireland, died at Louaine in great anguish of mind, and miserable penury, which yong gentleman was apt to al offices of worthinesse, if in his childhode he had not wanted discipline.

At the which time the French king, whilest that he was daunsing in the hall with 4. knights of his houshold, being disguised like a wilde man, hauing a short garment about him dressed with pitch and rosen, that the flare which was fastened to his strait coate might the better abide, and shew it selfe more plaine, he had béene sodainly burned to death (if god helpe had not chaunced) through the falshode of the Duke his brother that did aspire the kingdome, for as the king led the daunce, one that was hired thereto, bowing downe his torch, set fire on the towe, which being kindled burnt the strait garment, where finding matter méete to féede on, to wit pitch and rosen, burnt so spitefully, but a Lady séeing such daunger towards the kings person, ranne to him, and pulled him from the daunce, by which meanes the king was saued, but the foure knights could not by any meanes be holpen till their skinnes and flesh were scolpered, and they yéelded vp the Ghost. The French king in danger to be burnt by meanes of his traiterous brother.

This yéere the kings Bench and Chauncerie were remoued from London to Yorke, for the Archbishop of Yorke being Lord Chancellour did wish the commoditie of his Citie, but the nouelrie lasted not long, for with the same facility that they were remoued to Yorke, they were brought backe againe to London. Kings bench and Chancery remoued from London to Yorke.

The same yéere Aubery de Vére vncle and heire to Robert the late Duke of Ireland was restored in blod, and created Earle of Oxford. Iohn Deuerois, knight Constable of Douer, and the kings steward, died sodainly, in whose roume, Thomas Percy, that before was vice-chamberlaine, was made Lord Steward, and Thomas Beamound was made constable of Douer, and William Scrope was made vice Chamberlaine, who about ỳ same time bought of William Montacute Earle of Salisbury the Ile of Man, with the regality thereof, for the Lord of this Iland is called king, to whom it was lawfull to weare a crowne of gold, Thomas Percy the yonger was made warden of Burdeaux. An. reg. 17. Will. Scrope purchased the Ile of Man.

The Dukes of Lancaster and Glocester passed ouer into France, to make somewhat of the truce, or to conclude a finall peace betwixt the kingdomes: but it was not so brought to passe, as it was wished, by reason of the French kings sickenesse. the Clergie graunted to him a full tenth if he would passe thither, and if he went not, they graunted him but halfe a tenth. Certaine Lords of Scotland came into England to get worship by force of armes. The Earle of Marre challenged the Earle of Nottingham, to iust with him, and so they rode together certaine courses, but not the full chalenge, for the Earle of Marre was cast both horse and man, and two of his ribbes broken with the fall, so that he was borne out of Smithfield, and conueyed toward Scotland, but died by the way at Yorke. Sir William Darcel Knight, the Kings banner-bearer of Scotland, chalenged Sir Pierce Courtney Knight the kings banner-bearer of England, and when they had run certaine courses, they gaue ouer without conclusion of victorie. Then Cockborne Esquire of Scotland challenged Sir Nichols Hayberke Knight, and rode fiue courses, but Cockborne was borne ouer horse and man. The seuenth of June Queene Anne died at Shine in Southery, and was buried at Westminster. The King tooke her death so heauily, that besides cursing the place where she died, he did also for anger throwe downe the buildings vnto the which the former Kings being wearied of the Citie, were wont for pleasure to resort.

Iusting in Smithfield.

Queene Anne deceased.

An. reg. 18.

Thus the king, the Duke of Lancaster, and his sonne the Earle of Darbie, were widowers all at one time: for the Lady Constance Dutchesse of Lancaster, daughter to Peter King of Spaine, was but lately deceased, whilest the Duke her husband was in France. And the same time also deceased the Countesse of Darby, wife to Henry Earle of Darby. Moreouer, this yere deceased Isabel Dutches of Yorke, that was halfe sister to the Dutches of Lancaster, being borne of one mother, and she was buried at Langley in the Frier Church there by the Kings commandement.

Constance Dutchesse of Lancaster deceased.

Also this yere deceased that famous Knight, knowen to the world, Sir Iohn Hawkwood, whose deedes (saith Thomas Walsingham) require a speciall treatise. I finde by good record, that this Iohn Hawkwood was borne in Essex in the parish of Hingham Sibel, the sonne of Gilbert de Hawkwood Tanner, in his youth he was bound as an apprentice with a Taylor in the citie of London, and from thence was prest in the musters for seruice of King Edward the third in the warres of France, wherein he serued first as a common souldier in the roome of an Archer. Afterward he was made a captaine and had some charge commited vnto him, which he so well performed, as he was aduanced to the order of knighthood, and stood in good possibilitie to haue growne to great preferment by those warres if they had indured: for when the peace was concluded at Britaine, beside Chartiers in the yere of Christ 1360. he was then a poore knight, and had reaped small commoditie of those warres. Wherfore he ioyned himselfe with the companies, called the late commers, who assembled in great numbers, a fiue or sixe thousand English horsemen, and seeking after better gaine, made great spoyle of all the East parts of the kingdome of France, passing through Champaine, Burgondy, and Dampbin, euen to the very gates of Auignion in Prouence, where Clement the seuenth, Bishop of Rome, then held his residence and court of Cardinalles: from whence hee departed into Lombardy, hauing the leading of that part of the companies companies, which was called the white bande, with whom he serued valiantly in the warres of Iohn Marques of Mountferrato. But when Leonel Duke of Clarence sonne to Edward the 3. King of England came into Italy, to marry the Lady Violent, daughter of Galeasius, Viscount Lord of Millaine, he forsoke that seruice and attended the Duke to that marriage.

At which time Barnabe the brother of Galeasius had great warres with the territorie of the state of Mantua, and obtayned of the Duke of Clarence, that Sir Iohn Hawkwood being a Captaine, and principall man of his retinue might come to ayde him in his warres, for Barnabe being himselfe a warlike Prince, had a great desire to make some triall of the discipline and prowesse of the Englishmen. Sir Iohn Hawkwood therefore hauing in sundrie skirmishes with great courage, and consideration happily taken aduantageable occasions of victorie, and the Englishmen demeaning themselues worthily with their bowes and arrowes, did drawe Barnabe into that admiration of them, that he commended the discipline of this nation, and greatly regarded the prowes and discretion of Sir Iohn Hawkwood. And in short time after, to wit, the first yeare of King Richard, good liking increasing betweene them by entercourse of fauours and courtesies, he desired to haue him his sonne in lawe, and gaue him in marriage the Ladie Domnia his daughter, whom he had begotten of a noble woman, named Porra, with the value of tenne thousand Florenes of yearely reuenew, and after that time he maried not any other.

This alliance being made in respect of his valour in warre, was the occasion of the increase both of his pay, and of the renowne of the Englishmen throughout all Italie: That a most puissant Prince in warre, had not without sufficient cause to induce him, conceyued so good opinion of the valour of a man that was a stranger, and for this cause his seruice was required by the Princes and free Cities of Italy. For at that time all martiall affaires amongst the Italians were mannaged by forraine forces and Captaines.

It fortuned that vpon some displeasure conceiued the Englishmen that were left at Alba where the Duke of Clarence dyed, for the alliance past, made a sodaine reuolt from the friendshippe of Galeasius, and Barnabe, and ioyned themselues with their enemies, by which change of affections many of the Townes of Lombardy came to be wasted, by the outragious spoyles of the Englishmen, amongst other they toke the Towne of Faera, and Banacanallo, whereof he solde one to the Marques of Este for twentie thousand Crownes, and the other he kept, and after that Sir Iohn Hawkwood, hauing both his forces and pay increased, determined to seeke newe hopes, and newe aduentures. He went first to the ayde of Pope Gregorie the twelft, and hauing with great commendation recouered the Cities of Prouence that had reuolted from him, for his seruice therein was worthily rewarded with the dominion of fiue Townes. From him, he went to the Florentines, who profered great pay, and from them, not long after to the Pisanes, and then againe to the Florentines, vnder whome he serued with such a number of our nation both horse men and foote men that all Italie feared him, with that successe and increase of his commendation, and glorious renoume, that hée was easily reputed to bée the best Souldiour of that age, for hée had learned by his long experience in the warres, hauing an exceeding ripe and quicke conceipt, to force occasions, to frame his resolutions, and to make spéedie execution, being also as occasion required, both hot in his fight, and notable for his delayes, in so much as sundry great Captaines, who were afterward highly renowned, proceeded out of his Schoole, as from an exact Maister of Martiall affaires. The exploytes that he had atchieued, with good successe, were accompted for sure groundes and principles of Discipline, as well amongst his very enemies, as also amongst his owne followers.

After infinite victories obtained, and an incomparable renowme amongst all men for the same, he deceased at Florence being then an olde man, and was most honourably buried in the great Church of the same Citie, where after his death, the Senate in reward of his good deserning, bestowed vpon him the honour of a Tombe, with the Image of a man on horsebacke, as great as a mightie Pillar, for a Monument and testimonie of his great prowesse in warre, and exceeding fidelitie to their state. Notwithstanding his executours, or otherwise his friendes here in England, to wit, Robert Rokeden senior, Robert Rokeden iunior, and Iohn Coe, raysed a Monument, or Tombe arched ouer, and ingrauen to the likenesse of Haukes flying in a woode, in the Parish Church of Hingham-sible where he was borne, and founded there for him a Chantry, and another in the Priory of Hyngham Castle, to remember Iohn Haukewood Knight, Iohn Oliuer, and Thomas Newenton Esquires.

Irish people to auoid England.

About the moneth of August Proclamation was made that all Irish people should auoyde the Realme, and get them home before the feast of the nativitie of our Lady, vpon paine of life.

King Richard went into Ireland.

King Richard went ouer into Ireland, and the Duke of Glocester with him, and the Earles of March, Salisburie, Arundell, Nottingham and Rutland. The Irishmen being afraid of such preparation as was made, durst not shew themselues openly, but with secret assaultings they often troubled the Kings army, yet when the Englishmen preuailed, many of the Lords of the land submitted themselues to the king, of which some the king held with him, least they should attempt some new stirre.

1395. The King held his Christmasse at Dublin in Ireland, and after that feast held a Parliament there: also the same time the Duke of Yorke, the Lord Warden of England called a Parliament at London, to the which came (being sent forth of Ireland) the Duke of Glocester, the which before all the states shewed the Kings neede, who had now spent his treasure amongst the Irishmen, so that a tenth was granted by the Clergie, and a fifteenth by the Layty.

Parliament at London.

The same time the fauourers of Wikcliffes opinions, set vp on the gates of S. Pauls Church in London, and on the gates of Saint Peters Church at Westminster, Westminster, vehement accusations of the Cleargie, and conclusions such as had not bin heard of, among the which were these verses following.

Libels against the Cleargie.

Plangunt Anglorum gentes crimen Sodomorum,
Paulus fert, horum sunt Idola causa malorum.
Surgunt ingrati, corrupto semine nati,
Mentium prælati, hoc defensare parati,
Qui Reges estis, populis quicunque præestis,
Qualiter his gestis gladys probibere potestis.

They were mainteyned in this their doing, by some noble men & knights of this land, among which as chiefe were Sir Richard Stury, Sir Lewes de Clifford, Sir Thomas Latimer, sir Iohn Mountague, which did instigate them to confound if they might, the religious men: whereupon the Archbishop of Yorke, the Bishop of London and other, as messengers from the whole state of the cleargie passed ouer into Ireland, where to the King they made a grieuous complaint, beseeching him that he would returne with speede, to helpe the faith and Church that was now incredibly afflicted by lollardes, (as they termed them) how they might take away all the possessions of the Church, and that worse was, how they might take and destroy all Canonicall sanctions. King Richard hearing these things, determined to returne home the sooner. And when he was returned, he called before him, and rebuked certaine of the Nobles bitterly, threatning them, if they from thencefoorth fauoured these Lollards, or in any wise did comfort them he would extreamely punish them, he toke an othe of Sir Richard Stury, that from thence forth, he should not hold such opinions, which thing being done, the king said, and I sweare to thée that if thou euer violate thine othe, thou shalt die a shamefull death, other hearing such roaring of the Lion, plucked in their heads and lay close.

Sir Iohn Froisart of S. Patricks Purgatorie.

About this time Sir Iohn Froisart Chanon of Chimay in the Earledome of Heynault, as himselfe reporteth, came into England, he demaunded of Sir William Lisle (who had bèn with the King in Ireland) the manner of the hole that in Ireland is called Saint Patrikes Purgatory, if it were true that was said of it, or not: who answered, that such a hole there was, and that himselfe and another Knight had bèn there while the King lay at Dubline, & said they entred into the hole, and were closed in at the sunne set, and abode there all the night, and the nert morning issued out againe at the sunne rising: he said, that when he & his fellow were entred and past the gate that was called the Purgatory of Saint Patrike, and that they were descended and gone downe three or foure pases, as into a cellar, a certaine hote vapour rose against them, and strake so into their heads, that they were faine to sit downe on ỹ staires which were of stone: and after they had sate there a season, they had great desire to sleepe, and so fell into a slumber, and slept there all night. In the which sleepe they had marueilous dreames, other wise then they were wont to haue in their chambers: but in the morning after they had issued out, thy had cleane forgotten their dreames and visions.

King Richard sent messengers the Earle of Rutland, the Earle Marshall, the Archbishop of Dublin, the Bishop of Ely, Lewes Clifford, Henry Beaumount, mont, Hugh Spencer, and many other to Charles the French King, to treate with him for a marriage to be had betweene the King of England, and the French Kings eldest daughter named Isabell of eight yeeres old, who was already promised to the Duke of Britons sonne, by a treaty that was made at Toures in Thouraine. This was hard to be broken, for the French King and his vncles had sealed with the Duke of Brittaine.

The conquest of Ireland by K. Richard.

Now some what of the former voiage of King Richard into Ireland, as the same was reported to Sir Iohn Froisart, by an Esquire of England, named Henry Christall. Sir Iohn (quoth he) it is not in memorie, that euer any King of England made such prouision for any iourney into Ireland, nor such a number of men of armes, nor archers. The King was a nine moneths in the marches of Ireland to his great cost, and charge to the realme, for they bare all his expenses: and the merchant-cities, and good townes of the Realme thought it well bestowed, when they sawe the King returne home againe with honour. The number that he had thither, were foure thousand men of armes, and thirtie thousand archers, well payed weekely. But to shew the truth, Ireland is one of the euil Countries of the world to make warre vpon, or to bring vnder subiection, for it is closed strongly and wildely with high forrests, & great waters and marishes. It is hard to enter to doe them of the Countrey any domage: nor ye shall finde no Towne, nor person to speake withall. For the men drawe to the woodes, and dwell in Caues or small Cottages, vnder trées and among bushes, like wilde and sauage beasts: and when they knowe that any man maketh warre against them, being entred into their Countries, then they drawe together to the straites and passages to defend them, so that no man can enter into them. And when they see their time, they will some take their aduantage on their enemies, for they knowe the countrey, and are light people. For a man of armes, being neuer so well horsed, and runne he neuer so fast, the Irishmen will runne on foote as fast as he, and ouertake him, yea, and leape vp vpon his horse behinde him, and throwe him from his horse; for they are strong men in their armes, and haue sharpe weapons with large blades, two edged, wherewith they will slay their enemie, whom they neuer repute to be dead till they haue cut his throte, and opened his belly, and taken out his heart, which they carry away with them, some say they eate it, and haue great delight therein, they take no man to ransome. And when they see that they be ouermatched, then they will depart and hide themselues in bushes, woods, and caues, so that no man shall finde them: Sir William Windsore, who had most vsed the warres in those parts of any other Englishman, could neuer learne the manner of the Countrey. They be hard people, and of rude witte: and they set nothing by iollitie, nor fresh apparell, nor by noblenesse, for though their Countrey be soueraignely gouerned by Kings, whereof they haue many, yet will they abide and continue in their rudenesse.

Truth it is, that foure of the principall Kings, and most puissant after the manner of the countrey, are come to the obeysaunce of the King of England, by loue and faire meanes, and not by battell, or constraint. The Earle of Ormond, mond, who marcheth vpon them, hath taken great paine, and hath so intreated them, that they came to Dubline to the King, and submitted them to him, to be vnder the obeysance of the Crowne of England, wherefore the King and all the Realme reputeth this for a great and honourable acte. For King Edward did neuer so much vpon them, as King Richard did in his voyage. The honour is great, but the profit is but small, &c. The names of the foure Kings were these, first, the great Oneale King of Meth, the second Brine of Thomond king of Thomond, the third Arthure of Mackquemur king of Leinster, the fourth Conhne king of Cheueno and Drape, they were made knights by King Richard in the Cathedrall Church of Dubline: these foure Kings watched all the night before in the Church, and the next day at high Masse time, were made Knights, and with them Sir Thomas Orphew, Sir Iames Pado, and Sir Iohn Pado his cosin.

These Kings sate that day at the Table with King Richard, they were regarded of many people, because their behauiour was straunge to the manner of England.

When Sir Iohn Froisart desired to knowe howe it came to passe, that foure Kings of Ireland were so sone brought to the obeysance of King Richard, when King Edward the Kings grandfather, who was so valiant a Prince could neuer subdue them: Sir Henry Cristal answered, he could not tell, but as men said, the great puissance that the King had ouer with him, and remaining there nine moneths, abashed the Irishmen. Also the Sea was closed from them on all parts, whereby their merchandises might not enter into their Countries, though they that dwell farre within the Realme cared little for it, yet such as liue on the marches of England and by the Sea coast, vse feate of marchandise.

King Edward in his time, had to answere so many warres in France, Brytaine, Gascoigne, and Scotland, that his people were diuided in diuers places, wherefore, he could not send any great number into Ireland. But when the Irishmen sawe the great number of men of warre that King Richard had in this last iourney, they aduised themselues, and came to obeysance.

Moreouer there was of olde time in England a King named Edward, who is canonized as a Saint: This King in his time subdued the Danes, and discomfited them by battell on the sea three times: This Edward the Irishmen loued, and dread him much more then any King of England that had been before. And therefore King Richard this yere past, when he was in Ireland, in all his armories and deuises, he left the bearing of the armes of England, as the Leopardes and floure deluces, and bare the armes of Saint Edward, that is, a crosse patent golde and gules, with foure white Martelets in the field, whereof it was said, the Irishmen were well pleased, and the sooner inclined to him, and haue done to him faith and homage in like manner as their Predecessours sometime did to King Edward. Thus haue I shewed the manner howe King Richard had this yere accomplished his voyage in Ireland.

In this meane space the English Lords rid from Caleis to Amiens, and to Claremount in Beauuyn, and so to Paris, where they were lodged about the Crosse of Tyzener, they were fiue hundzed hozses. The French King was lodged at the Castle of Lowze, and the Quéene with her children at the house of S. Paul vpon the riuer Saine. The Duke of Berrey at the house of Nelle, the Duke of Burgoine at the house of Arthois, and the Duke of Burbon in his owne house, the Duke of Orleans, the Earle of S. Paul, and the Lord Cowsey at their owne houses.

The King had assembled there all his Councell, to the intent to make the better answer to the Embassadours of England. He commanded euery day to be deliuered to these Embassadozs 200. Crownes foz their sinal expences, and foz their hozses. And the chiefe, as the Earle Marshall, and the Earle of Rutland, were oftentimes with the king and dined with him. These Lozds desired euer to haue answere, and hauing bèn at Paris. rr. dayes and their charges payd by the French King, a reasonable answere was giuen them, so that they were put in great hope to bzing about that they came foz, howbeit the French men said it could not be done shortly, because the Lady was so yong, and also that she was affianced to the Duke of Bzitaines eldest sonne, wherefoze they must treate to bzeake that pzomise, oz they could pzocéde any further, & thereupon the French King should send into England the next Lent, to shew how the matter went. With which answere the Englishmen were contented, they toke their leaue & departed from Paris to Caleis, and so to England, the King was ioyous of their comming, and well contented with their answere.

An. reg. 19.

About Michaelmas the Duke of Lancaster returned out of Gascoine into England, foz that he had not bèn receiued in Gascoigne, as he thought he should haue bèn, foz the people there did vtterly reiect him, from bearing gouernement ouer them. The King made him good chère, and all the Winter folowing oft times sent to the French King, concerning the marriage, and was well inclined to haue peace, these pursutes and treaties toke such effect, that their matter dzewe nére to a point, so that such Embassadours as were first sent out of England into France, and were againe lodged in Paris, were in number fiue hundzed, and solourned in Paris moze then thzée wéekes.

The Duke of Lancaster returned out of Gascoigne.

This yére England suffered great losse by pirats, that belonged vnto the Quéene of Denmarke, who spoiled mariners and merchants, especially the men of Nozffolke that assembled a multitude together, and toke vpon them to fight with them, but the enemies pzeuailing, many of them were slaine, and very many taken pzisoners, were reserued foz ransome with the losse of twenty thousand pounds, which they had abozde with them to make their marchandise.

Pirats of Démarke rob the English.

This yére deceased Iohn of Waltham Bishop of Salisbury, Treasurer of England, who had pleased the King so greatly, that (though many murmured at it) he commanded him to be buried at Westminster among the Kings. After him Roger Walden the Kings secretary and treasurer of Caleis, was made Treasurer. Iohn de Metford Bishop of Chichester was translated to Salisbury, and the Archbishop of Diuelin to Chichester. Also Thomas Brantingham Bishop of Exceter deceased, after whom succéded Edmond mond Stafford bearer of the priuie Seale. Henry Wakefield Bishop of Worcester deceased, vnto whom succéeded at the Kings request a monke of Chester, called Tideman a Phisition.

In the moneth of November King Richard caused the body of his déere frende Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland, to be brought from Louane, and after to be buried in the priory of Colne in Esser, with solemne funerals, which he honoured with his presence, and caused the Coffin of Cipres, wherein his body being embalmed lay, to be opened, that he might behold his face, & touch him with his fingers openly shewing his loue to the dead carkasse, which he bare him when he was aliue, there were at the same funeralles with the king, the Countesse of Orford, mother of the deceased Duke, the Archbishop of Canterbury, many other Bishops, Abbots, Priors, and other religious men, but yet there were few of the Nobles, for they had not digested the hatred they had conceiued against him. Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland.

The Embassadours of England being at Paris with the French King, their matters toke such effect, that it was fully agréed that the King of England should haue in marriage Isabell the eldest daughter of King Charles, and by vertue of procuration the Earle Marshall affianced and espoused her in the name of the King of England, & so from thencefoorth she was called Quéene of England. The Englishmen toke their leaue and departed to Caleis and so into England. The King was glad of their returne, and so were other, but whosoeuer was glad of this marriage, the Duke of Glocester vncle vnto the King made no ioy thereof, for he saw well, that by reason of that marriage and alliance, peace should be betwéene the kings, and their realmes, which greeued him, & of this matter he would oftentimes speake with his brother the Duke of Yorke, and driue him as much as he could to his opinions, for he was but a soft Prince. But to the Duke of Lancaster his eldest brother, he durst not speake ouer largely, for he saw well that he was of the Kings opinion, and was well pleased with the Kings marriage. Froissart.

This yéere the King held his feast of Christmasse at Langley, whither came to him the Duke of Lancaster, and he receiued the Duke with honour, but not with loue, as was thought, he therefore taking leaue of the King, departed from the court toward Lincolne, where Katharine Swinford then lay, whom after the feast of the Epiphanie, (al men wondering at the strangenesse of the déede) he toke to wife. This woman was borne in Henault, daughter to Sir Paine Ruit, a Knight of that Countrey, she was in her youth brought vp in the Duke of Lancasters house, and attended on his first wife Blanch the Dutchesse of Lancaster: and in the dayes of his second wife the Dutchesse Constance of Spaine, he kept the said Katharine to be his concubine, who after was married to a Knight of England named Swinford, that was now deceased. Before she was married, the Duke had by her foure children, three sons, & a daughter, one of the sons hight Iohn Bewford, the second Thomas de Bewford, and the other Henry, who was brought vp at Aron in Almaine, proued a good Lawyer, and was after Bishop of Winchester, and Ioan a daughter for the loue the Duke had to those his children, he married their mother, the 1399. John Duke of Lancaster, maried Katherine Swinford.

saide Katharine Swinford, being now a widow, as before is saide. The great Ladies of England, as the duchesse of Glouceſter, the counteſſe of Darby, the counteſſe of Arundell, and others deſcended of the bloud royall, greatly diſdayned that ſhée ſhould bée matched with the Duke of Lancaſter, and by that meanes accounted ſecond perſon in the Realme, and be preferred in roume afore them; and therefore they ſaid they would not come where ſhée ſhould be preſent, for it ſhould bée a ſhame to them, that a woman of ſo baſe birth, that had bén concubine to the Duke ſhould goe and haue place before them.

Hector Boetius. This yére during the peace, many Noble men of England frequented Scotland, and many Scottes frequented England, through the which, oftimes, many honourable tornements were done betwixt Engliſhmen and Scottes, in defence of their honours and glorie in armes: Among whom was not a little praiſed, the honourable victory gotten by Dauid Crauford Iuſting on London bridge. on the Bridge at London againſt the Lord Welles in this manner: The Lord Welles was ſent Embaſſadour into Scotland, concerning certaine high matters betwixt the two Kings of England and Scotland, and when he was at a ſolemne banquet, where Scottiſh men and Engliſhmen were communing of déedes of armes, the Lord Welles ſaid, Let words haue no place, if ye know not the chiualry and valiant déedes of Engliſhmen, appoint me a day and place when ye liſt, and ye ſhall haue experience. Then ſaid Dauid Earle of Crauford, I aſſent, and incontinently, by conſent of either party, a day and place was aſſigned. The Lord Welles choſe the bridge of London for the place, and Earle Dauid choſe S. Georges day for the time. Thus departed the Lord Welles toward London. Afore the day Earle Dauid came with thirtie perſons well appointed to London: As ſone as the day of battell was come, both the parties were conueyed to the bridge, and ſone after by ſound of trumpet, the two parties ran haſtely together, on their barbed horſes, with ſquare grounden ſpeares to the death. Earle Dauid notwithſtanding the valiant dint of ſpeares broken on his helmet, and viſage, ſate ſo ſtrongly, that the people moued with vaine ſuſpition, cryed, Earle Dauid contrary to the law of armes, is bound to the ſaddle: Earle Dauid hearing this murmure, diſmounted off his horſe, and without any ſupport or helpe aſcended againe into the ſaddle. Incontinent they ruſhed together with the newe ſpeares, the ſecond time with burning ire to conquer honour: but in the third courſe the Lord Welles was ſent out of his ſaddle, with ſuch a violence, that he fell to the ground: Earle Dauid ſéeing his fall, diſmounted haſtely from his horſe, and tenderly embraced him, that the people might vnderſtand, he fought with no hatred, but onely for the glory of victory: and in the ſigne of more humanitie, he viſited him euery day, while he recouered his health, and then returned into Scotland.

Froiſart. The ſame ſeaſon was ſent into England from the French King, Valerian Earle of S. Paul with certaine articles concerning the treaty of the peace. The King receiued him ioyouſly, and heard well his meſſage, and ſaid vnto him aparte, Faire brother, as to the treatie of peace betwéene mé and my my father of France, I am right well inclined thereunto, my brethren, and two vncles of Lancaster and Yorke incline right well thereunto: but mine vncle the Duke of Gloucester, who is a right perillous man, letteth it as much as he can. Sir, quoth the Earle of Saint Paule, it behoueth you to winne him with faire words, and giue him great gifts. In the name of God (said the king) ye say well, and thus shall I doe. The Earle of Saint Paule said, the French king with his vncles should come to Saint Omers, and bring with him his daughter, so that the king of England would come to Calais, and so betweene Saint Omers and Calais the two kings should mete and speake together, whereby should increase loue and amity: And if they could not conclude on some peace, yet at the least the truce might be prolonged to endure for thirtie or fortie yeeres, betweene the two realmes, and their allies: this deuise seemed good.

And so when euery thing was readie, the king and the Earle of Saint Paul passed ouer. And the king of England with his vncles came to Calais with many Lords and Ladies: and the Duke of Burgoyne one of the French kings vncles came to Saint Omers, and from thence to Calais, to the king of England, and there consulted together on certaine articles of the peace, whereunto the K. of England lightly inclined. The Duke of Burgoyne and Earle of Saint Paule returned to Saint Omers, &c. And the king of England with his vncles into England, leauing their wiues at Calais, til their returne. King Richard sailed to Calais. Ann. reg. 20

William Courtney Archbishop of Canterbury, deceased on the first of August, after he had sate Archbishop of Canterbury fifteene yeeres & more: this William Courtney vpon the dissolution of the Hospitall, called Nous operis at Maidstone, erected there a Colledge secular Priestes, the master to be a Prebend, which Colledge at the general suppression was valued in land by yeere at 139. pounds, seuen shillings fiue pence: he builded much at Maidstone: hee gaue by testament 1000. markes towards the amendement of the body of the Church of Christ in Canterbury, where he was buried. Thomas Arundell brother to the Earle of Arundell succeeded him in the Archbishoprike of Canterbury, he had beene first Bishop of Ely, where he had made much faire building in the palace, he gaue to ỳ Church there a table of gold & precious stones valued at 300. markes, he built the great gate-house of his Inne in Holborne of London: he was from thence translated to Yorke, where besides his great building, & rich ornaments giuen, he gaue to that Church, of plate two great basons of siluer and gilt, two great censars, two other basons of siluer, and two cruses, he gaue to the vse of the Vicars a siluer cup of great weight, and a bolle of siluer of an higher price, for the vse of the Chapter, &c. and was now translated to the sea of Canterbury, he forthwith renounced his office of chancellor, whereunto was admitted Edmond Stafford Bishop of Exceter. Courtney Archbishop of Canterbury deceased.

Ye haue heard how the king of England was returned from Calais into England, & there remained till Michaelmasse, that the Parliament at Westminster should beginne. In the meane season great prouision was made at Calais, and at Guisnes for the king & his Lords sent from the ports of England on that coast, also great prouision was had of Flaunders, al which came Parleament at Westminster.

by sea to Caleis, And likewise for the French king and his brother the Duke of Orleans, and his vncles and other Prelates and Lords of Fraunce, great prouision was made at Saint Omers, at Ayre, at Tyrwin, at Arde, Mountoire, and at all other houses and Abbeyes thereabout, there was nothing spared on eyther part, especially the Abbey of Saint Bertine was well replenished of all things to receiue the kings.

The Parliament beganne at Westminster, at Michaelmasse, and it was ordained to endure eight and fortie daies, but it was abridged; for the king would not tarry there more then fiue daies, wherein he declared the things pertayning to the Realme, especially such matter as touched himselfe, and the cause why he came from Caleis. Which things being dispatched, the king returned againe to Caleis with his Vncles of Lancaster and Glocester, and other Prelates and Lords of England. The Duke of Yorke tarried still in England with the Earle of Darby to gouerne the Realme in the kings absence. Assone as the French king knew that the king of England was returned to Caleis, hee sent to him the Earle of Saint Paule to shew him what order was taken in Fraunce concerning his marriage, which the king liked well.

Then the Duke of Lancaster and his sonne, the Duke of Glocester and his sonne, the Earle of Rutland, the Earle marshall, Earle of Huntington, the kings Chamberlaine and many other Lords and knights, Esquires and Ladies, rode with the Earle of S. Paule, to S. Omers, where they were well receiued of the Duke of Burgoyne, and of the Dutchesse, the Duke of Britaine and other. All the chere that could be deuised was made to the English Lords and Ladies: there was the Dutchesse of Lancaster, her son, and two daughters, there was great gifts giuen of plate, of golde and siluer, nothing was spared, insomuch that the Englishmen had maruaile, especially the Duke of Glocester, who saide to his counsell, I see well there is great riches in the Realme of France, there was much giuen to him: he toke euer all their gifts, but alwaies the rancor abode in his heart: which the Duke of Burgoine well perceiued. When the Lords and Ladies of England had been royally feasted, then was communication had how the two kings should mete and speake together, and how the Ladie should be deliuered, wherupon appointment was made, and leaue taken on all parts. The English part returned to Caleis to the king, and shewed what chere they had, and what presents had been giuen them, which newes pleased well the king.

Anon after the French king came to Saint Omers, hauing the Duke of Britaine in his company, where it was ordained that the Dukes of Berry, Burgoyne and Burbon, should go to Caleis to speake with the king of England, where they were ioyously receiued, and had as good chere as could be deuised. The three Dukes had secret communication with the king & his counsell, from whence they returned to Saint Omers to the French king, and shewed how they had sped. Then the French king went to the Basted of Ard, the Duke of Burgoyne to Mountoire, the Duke of Britaine to the towne of Esquie, and the Duke of Berry to Balingham. In euery parte about, there were were pitcht vp tents and pauilions, and all the countrey full of people, what of Fraunce and of England. The king of Englande came to Guisnes with the Duke of Lancaster, and the Duke of Gloucester to Hames.

Thus on the Eeue of Simon and Iude, about ten of the clocke in the forenoon, the kings departed out of the tents the which were pight not farre asunder, and came a foote the one to the other, and met at a certaine place appointed, on the one side there was aranged 400. knights of Fraunce, armed with their swords drawen: And on the other part, 400. knights of England in like manner, so the two kings passed thorow them.

The Dukes of Lancaster and of Gloucester ledde the French king, and the Duke of Berrey, and of Burgoine led the king of England, thus came forth the 800. knights, all which knights, when the two kings came iust together, kneeled downe, the two kings met together bare headed, and a little inclined, and toke each other by the hands, then the French king led the king of England into his tent, which was noble and rich, and the foure Dukes toke each other by the hands, and followed the two kings, and other knights after, the Frenchmen on the one side, and the Englishmen on the other side: and so they stod regarding each other till all was done. So the two kings hand in hand entred the French kings tent. Then the foure Dukes kneeled downe before the kings, and they raised them vp and so talked together: then the two kings went a little apart, & talked a certaine space. In the meane time wine and spices were brought, the Duke of Berrey serued the French king of spice, & the Duke of Burgoyne of wine: And the Dukes of Lancaster & Gloucester serued the king of England, & other Knights & Esquires serued the other Prelates and Lords. This businesse done, the two kings toke leaue each of other, & so returned to their tents, & toke their horses and rode, the king of England to Guisnes, the Dukes of Lancaster, & Gloucester, to Hames, & the other to Caleis: the French K. rode to Cordre, & the Duke of Orleans with him, the Duke of Berrey to Dornam, & the Duke of Burgoyne to Mountoire. Meeting of the king of England and of France.

On Simon & Iudes day, about 11. a clocke, the king of England & his Uncles and other Lords came to the French king into his tent, where they were receiued right honourably. Then tables were set vp, and the two kings sate at one table alone, the French king on the right hand, the Dukes of Berrey, Burgoyne & of Burbon serued the two kings. This dinner was taken in the French kings tent, & after wine & spices taken, the yong Quéene was brought forth accompanied with a great number of Ladies & damosels, & there shé was deliuered to the king of England, & euery man toke their leaue to depart. The yong Quéene was set in a rich litter, and there went no more French Ladies with her but the Lady of Coucy, there ware Ladies of England, the Dutchesse of Lancaster, Yorke, Gloucester, the Lady Namure, the Lady Poynings, & many other, who receiued the Quéene with great ioy. Thus the king of England and his young Quéene, with their company rode to Caleis the same night. And the French king and his company to Saint Omers.

After the kings returne to Caleis, ere Allhallowne day in solemne wise, hé maried the Lady Isabel in the Church of S. Nicholas at Caleis, the Archbishop of King Richard maried Isabell th French K. daughter.

of Canterbury doing the office, at the which time there was a great feast, and great larges.

On the next morrow the Dukes of Orleance and Burbon came to Calais, to see the king & the Quéene, and on the next morrow they toke their leaue, and departed to S. Omers to the French king, and the same day the king and the Quéene tok their ship, and had faire passage: for within three houres they arriued at Douer, notwithstanding by tempest they lost their tents and houshold stuffe, from Douer they rode to Rochester, to Dertford, to Eltham, and so to London, whereof the Citizens béeing warned, made out certaine horsemen well appointed, all in one liuery of colour, with deuises imbrodered on their sléeues, that euery company might be knowen from other, the which with the Maior and his brethren, clothed in Scarlet, mette the king and Quéene on the blacke Heath, and there doing their duties, and attended vpon them till they came to Newinton, where the king commaunded the Maior with his company to returne, for that he was appointed to lodge that night at Kenington.

Quéene Isabell crowned.

The 13. of Nouembr, the young Quéene was conueyed from Kenington, through Southwark, with great pomp vnto the Tower of London, at which time there went such a multitude of people to sée her, that vpon London bridge nine persons were crowded to death, of whom the Prior of Tiptor in Esser was one, and a worshipful matrone that dwelt in Cornhil was another. The morow after she was conueyed to Westminster, and there crowned with all the honour that might be deuised.

Parliament at London. 1397.

The 22. of January a Parliament began at London, in the which the Duke of Lancaster caused to be made legitimate, the issue which he had begotten of Katherine Swinford, before she was his wife. And the same time Iohn sonne to the said Duke of Lancaster and the said Katherine, was created Earle of Somerset, and the Duke gaue him to surname sir Bello Forto or Bowfort. It was ordained in this Parliament, that Iustices should not haue to sit with them any as assistant: there was a tenth granted by the Cleargy to the king. At this time king Richard contrary to his oath, reuoked Robert Belknape, Iohn Holt, William Brugh knights of the Bath, and Iustices, forth of Ireland.

This yéere when the realme of England séemed to enioy the chiefest peace that might be, by reason of the kings marriage, and the great riches that were heaped vp together by the same, and by the reason of the truce of 30. yéers established, and the presence of so many noble men as the like no forraine realme was able to shew, sodainly al things were troubled & brought into a turmoile whiles the king at Plashy in Esser, vpon a sodaine toke his vncle the Duke of Glocester by force of armes, he suspecting no such thing, & caused him to be conueied to Calais, there to be kept in prison, & caused the Earle of Warwick to be arrested and imprisoned, the same day that he had bidden him to dinner, got withstanding that he shewed him very good countenance, & had promised him great friendship: beside that he deceiued the Earle of Arundel with fayre words, (who was well able to haue defended himselfe, & to haue deliuered his friends, the Duke of Glocester & the Earle of Warwicke,) and not withstanding ding hée yéelded himselfe quietly, he sent him to the Ile of Wight, there to be imprisoned vntill the Parliament. And to the end there should be no commotion among the commons for the imprisoning of the Nobles, he caused to be proclaimed that the apprehensiõ of them, was not for any old displeasure, but for new transgressions committed against the king, shortly after he caused the said Nobles to be indited at Nottingham, and suborned such as should appeach them in the next Parliament, to wit, Edw. Earle of Rutland, Thomas Mowbrey Earle marshall, Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, Iohn Holland Earle of Huntington, Iohn Bewford Earle of Somerset, Iohn Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, & Tho. Spencer, Wil. Scrope the K. Chamberlaine. And in the meane season the king assembled together to guarde his person, many malefactors of the Countie of Chester which kept watch and ward both day and night about him. Then the king caused a great and generall Parliament to be summoned at Westminster, where he caused a great Hall to be builded in the midst of the pallace betwixt the clocke tower, and the dwze of the greate Hall: This Parliament beganne about the fiftéenth of September, at the beginning whereof Edward Stafford Bishop of Exceter Lord Chancellor, made a proposition or sermon, in the which he affirmed that the power of the king was alone and perfect of it selfe, and those that impeached it were worthy to suffer paine of the law: to this Parliament all the Nobles came with their retinue in armes, for feare of the king: the prolocutors were knights, in whom no gwdnesse at all could be found, but a naturall couetousnesse, vnsatiable ambition, intollerable pride, and hatred of the truth, their names were Iohn Bushy, William Bagot, and Thomas Greene. These required chiefly to haue the Charters of pardons reuoked and disanulled: and Bushy said to the king, because we are charged to say what they be that haue committed any offence against your maiestie, and regal authority, we say that Thomas Duke of Gloucester and Richard Earle of Arundel, in the 18. yéere of your raigne, haue traiterously compelled you, by meane of the new Archbishop of Canterbury then Chancellor, to grant to them a commission to gouerne your Realme, and to dispose of the state thereof, to the preiudice of your maiestie and royaltie. The same day was that commission disanulled with all Articles depending thereupon. Also the generall pardon granted after the great Parliament by them procured, and one spectall pardon for the Earle of Arundell were reuoked.

Tho. Walsing. Bushe, Bagot, and Greene.

Also there was a petition made by the commons, Iohn Bushy speaking for them, that the generall pardon procured and got forth, the Archbishoppe of Canterbury then Chancellor procuring it, should be disanulled; and hée to be iudged a traytor for granting to it: whereupon the Archbishop rose and would haue answered, but the king said, to morrow, to morrow; but hée came not into the Parliament house againe: the king said, that he would deliberate of the commons petition.

Also it was established, that any traitor conuicted to stand against the kings regality, should be adiudged worthy to suffer punishment to be appointed for such offence.

And

Foure thousand Archers compassed the Parliament house, readie to shoote.

And it was enacted, that criminall causes from thencefoorth should be determined in euery Parliament, and then licence being had to depart, a great sturre was made as is vsed, whereupon the kings Archers, in number foure thousand, compassed the Parliament house, thinking there had beene in the house some broyle or fighting, with their bowes bent, their arrowes nocked, and drawing, ready to shoote, to the terror of all that were there, but the king herewith comming, pacified them. On the next day, the Prelates were iniopned, vpon paine of losing their temporalities, that they should the same day agree vpon some procurator, to consent in their names to al things in that parliament, to be dispatched, & the king had these words: Sir Iohn Bushy, because many desire that I would explaine the fiftie persons exempted in the generall pardon, I will briefely: that what man soeuer desireth this, is worthy of death: first, because he sleeth: secondly, because I haue excepted those that are to be impeached in this Parliament: thirdly, because other of their associates bearing them oppressed, would be afraid where no feare is. On the next day, the Archbishop of Canterbury commeth to the pallace to appeare in the Parliament, but the king commaunded him by the Bishoppe of Carlile that he should returne to his house, and from thencefoorth be appeared not. The Prelates made Thomas Percy the kings Steward of household, their procuratour, to consent in all things in this Parliament to be done. Also sir Iohn Bushy had these words, our Soueraigne Lord the king, because the second Article in the Parliament is for punishment to be appointed for such as violate the Kings royall authoritie, I beseech your grace that you will authorize mee by way of appealing, of accusing, or impeaching, with licence to make declaration from one to the rest so often and when to me and my fellowes it may seeme expedient, and it was granted: then Bushy had these words, I accuse Thomas of Arundell, Archbishop of Canterbury, of three fold treason.

First, of the commission in granting the regiment or gouernement of the Realme to Thomas Duke of Glocester, and to Richard Earle of Arundell at his instance, who rather because hee was your Chancellor, should haue refused it.

Secondly, for that vnder pretence of that commission, they traiterously vsurping the iurisdiction of your royall authority, held a solemne Parliament traiterously in preiudice of your regaltie.

Thirdly, because that by the said vsurping, Sir Simon de Burley, and Sir Iames Barnes Knightes, and faithfull Lieges to you, were traiterously murthered, and put to death, of which things, wee your Commons demaund iudgement, worthy of so high treason, to be terribly pronounced by you, and because the Archbishoppe is a man of great consanguinitie, affinitie, power, and most politike wit, and cruell nature, for the preseruation of your estate, and the whole kingdomes, by the petition of this present Parliament, I require that he may be put into safe custody, vntill the finall execution of his iudgement.

The king hereunto answered, that for the excellence of his dignity he would take deliberation till the next morrow, and all other that were put into the same same commission, hée pronounced them to be his faithfull liege people, and bolde from that treason, and especially Alexander Neuell, late Archbishoppe of Yorke, and then sir Edmond of Langley, Duke of Yorke, Uncle to the king, and sir William Wikeham Bishoppe of Winchester, that were into the same Commission, with teares fell downe on the ground before the king, and gaue him humble thankes for that grace and benefite bestowed on them.

Also on S. Matthewes day, Edward Earle of Rutland, the Earles of Kent, Huntington, Nottingham, Somerset, and Salisbury, with the Lords Spencer and Scrope, in a sute of red gownes of silke garded, and bordered with white silke, and embrodered with Letters of Golde, proponed the appeale by them to the king at Nottingham, before set forth: in the which, they accused Thomas Duke of Glocester, Richard Earle of Arundell, Thomas Earle of Warwike, and Thomas de Mortimere Knight, of the premised treasons, and of an armed insurrection of Haringey Parke, traiterously attempted against the king, and putting in sureties for the prosecuting of their appeale. Richard Earle of Arundel was arraigned in a red Gown, and a Scarlet hood, and forthwith the Duke of Lancaster said to the Lord Neuell, take from him his girdle and hode, and so it was done, and herewith the Articles of appeale being to the said Earle declared, with a valiant and a bolde minde, he denied that hée was a traytour, and required the benefite of the pardon, protesting that he would not go from the fauour of the king and his grace. The Duke of Lancaster said to him, thou traytour, that pardon is reuoked. The Earle answered, truly thou lyest, I was neuer traitour. Also, the Duke of Lancaster said, why diddest thou purchase thy pardon? the Earle answered, to escape the tongues of mine enemies, of whom thou art one, and verely, as farre forth as toucheth treason, thou hast more nede of pardon then I. The king said, make answere vnto thine appeale. The Earle answered, I see well that these persons haue accused me of treason, shewing the appealements, but truly they all lye, I was neuer traytour, but I aske alwaies the benefite of my pardon, the which your grace granted to mée within these fiue yéeres now last past, béeing of full age, and of your francke good will and proper motion. Then said the king, I did so grant it that it should not bée against mée: then saide the Duke of Lancaster, then the graunt auayleth not. The Earle answered, truly of that pardon I knowe lesse then thy selfe, that was then on the further side the Seas. Then said Sir Iohn Bushy, that pardon is reuoked by the king, the Lords, and vs his faithfull people: the Earle answered, where be those faithfull people? I know thée well and thy company, how yée are gathered together, not to deale faithfully, for the faithfull people of the Realme are not héere, and therefore the people doe lament for mée, and well I know that thou hast béene euer false. And then Bushy and his fellowes cryed out. Behold soueraigne Lord and king, howe this traytour goeth about to raise sedition betwixt vs, and those people that are at home. The Earle answered, yée lye, I am no traytour. Then rose the Earle of Darby and said, diddest thou not say thus to mée at Huntington, where wée were first assembled together to rise, that it was the best afore all things to take the king. The Earle said to the Earle of Darby, thou lyest on thy head, I neuer thought of my Soueraigne Lord the king, but that [illegible] was good, and for his honour. Then said the king, diddest not thou say to mée in time of thy Parliament, in the Bathe behind the White Hall, that Sir Simon de Burley was worthie of death for many causes? and I answered, that I knew no cause of death in him, and yet thou and thy fellowes diddest traiterously put him to death, and then the Duke of Lancaster pronounced iudgement against him in this manner: Richard, I Iohn, Steward of England, iudge thée to bée a Traytour, and I condemne thée to bée drawen and hanged, to bée beheaded and quartered, and thy landes, tayled and not tayled, from thée and from thine heires of thy body descending, to be confiscate: then the king for reuerence of his blood, commaunded him onely to be beheaded, and then was hée ledde to the Tower hill, and there beheaded: the Augustine Friers in London toke vp his body and buried it in their Church, on the North side of their Quire, and after on his graue a sumptuous Tombe was set of marble stone. Also the same day, the king appointed the Lord Cobham (accused by the cõmons) to be arraigned. Also vpon the Saterday, sir Thomas de Mortimer was summoned, vpon paine to be banished as a Traytor, within fiue moneths to come to be tryed in iudgement: and then said the king, peraduenture the Earle of March cannot take him, and therefore I will so long stay for his certificate out of Ireland.

Earle of Arundel beheaded.

Also, a declaration was made, that all benefices or gifts, granted or alienated by those that were already condemned, or after were to be condemned in this Parliamẽt, and other whatsoeuer, granted sithence the tenth yéere of this kings raigne, should be reuoked. Also, on Monday following, the certificate giuen in of the Earle of Nottingham, then captaine of Calets, in whose custody the Duke of Glocester was, that the same Duke might not be brought to be tried in iudgement, because he was dead in his custody at Calets, at the petition yet of the said appellants, the same sentence was pronounced against him which had bẽne pronounced earst against the Earle of Arundell.

Duke of Glocester condemned to die after he was dead.

Also the Archbish of Canterbury, first his temporalties being confiscated was banished the realme. On the Tuesday, Rikell one of the kings Iustices, borne in Ireland, read certaine confessions drawen in writing vpon the said treasons, affirming that the same were the confessions of the said Duke, by him put forth or discouered, and written with his owne hand.

Archbishop of Canterbury his goods confiscate.

Also, the Earledome of Chester was aduanced to the honour of a principality, by annexing thereto the lands of the said Earle of Arundell confiscate.

Also, the same day, Iohn Earle of Salisbury made request to haue a Scire facias granted to him against the Earle of March, for the Lordship of Denbigh in Wales, and the king answered thereupon that he would take deliberation. Also on the Wednesday, it was ordained, that the lands of the said Earle of Arundell, annexed to the Duchie of Chester, should enioy the liberties of the same Duchie, excepted that to the Welchmen of those parts, their old lawes and customes should still remaine and be continued.

King Richard caused the great Hall at Westminster to be repaired, both the walles, windowes, and roffe, with a marueilous worke, and great costs, which he leuied of strangers banished out of their countreyes, who obtayned licence to remayne in this countrey, by the kings Charter which they had purchased with great summes of money.

Parliament at Shrewsbury.

King Richard kept his Christmas at Leichfield, and then toke his iourney towards Shrewsbury, where the Parliament lately prorogued, began againe, in the which it was ordayned, that all Statutes ordayned at Westminster in the xi. yeere of the kings raigne, should be reuoked and disanulled, and all the articles of the same, and the heires of them that were adiudged in the saide Parliament, should be reconciled, and restored to all their lands, inheritances, and possessions: excepted, that they should haue no clayme against the withholders of the profits, and reuennes of those lands in the meane time. On the morrow it was ordayned that the heires of them which were iudged and conuicted in the foure Articles of high treason, should not enioy the landes, nor any possessions of their progenitors, but should be excluded from all and euerie action and clayme for euer.

The first Article of high treason was this, if any man, of what condition soeuer he were, did imagine the kings death.

The second Article was, if any man should haue an imagination to depose the king.

The third, if any man did ride armed within the Realme of England in manner of warre against the king.

The fourth was, if any man disclaymed the kings homage.

Also the same day, the Lord Cobham was arraigned, to make answere vnto the two Articles of high treason.

The first was, that the said Lord Cobham was in counsell to make one commission against the state of the king: and likewise, that he vsed the same commission in doing iudgement against the kings will, and to the preiudice of him.

The second, that he sate in iudgement to iudge sir Simon de Burley, and James Barnes Knights of the Kings; in his absence, and against his will: and vpon this, hee was conuict and iudged to perpetuall prison within the Isle of Jersey.

Henry Duke of Hereford accused Thomas Duke of Norffolke.

On the morrow, Henry Duke of Hereforde accused Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norffolke, of certaine words by him spoken, as they rode betweene London and Brayneford, tending to the dishonour of the kings person, which the Duke of Norffolke vtterly denied to haue spoken; whereupon a combate was

A fiftéenth and a halfe was granted, and the customes of Wooles, fiftie shillings of euery Sacke of euery Englishman borne, and thrée pound of euery stranger.

This Parliament ended, the king visited many places in the West part of England, as Worcester, Hereford, Bristow, Glastenbury and Bath.

After this also, the king caused a Theatre to be made at Bristow, for a combate to be fought betwéene two Scots, to wit, the one being an Esquire appellant, & the other a knight defendant, and the appellant was ouercome and hanged: but after this time, he made a great & marueilous strong Theatre at Couentrie for the combate betwixt the Duke of Hereford, and the Duke of Norffolke, and gaue them day for the fight, the 16. of September, to wit, the feast day of S. Edith, at which day and place, a great concourse and assembly of people was there gathered out of all parts of England. When the saide Champions appeared in the Listes, ready to fight, the king commanded them to be quiet and not to fight, & then the K. sitting in his royall apparrel within his tent girt with his sword, he commanded his decrée to be proclaimed, & this was the kings decrée, that Henry Duke of Hereford, for his disobedience towards the king should be banished for tenne yéeres, and likewise the Duke of Norffolke to be banished for euer out of England, taking of his reuenues a thousand markes by yéere, till the towne of Calets were repaired. Ann. reg. 22. Dukes banished.

At the feast of S. Michael, the king caused seuentéene Counties in East England to bée indited, and laid to their charges, that they had béene against him, with the Duke of Glocester, the Earles of Arundell & Warwike, wherfore he sent honourable men to induce the Lords both spirituall and temporall, to make a submission by writing, sealed with their owne hands, acknowledging themselues to be traytors to the king, though they neuer offended him in word or déed. Moreouer, he compelled all the religious gentlemen and commons, to set their seales to blankes, to the end hée might as it pleased him oppresse them seuerally, or all at once: some of the commons paid 1000. markes, some 1000. pounds, &c. Blanke Charters.

Also, he ordained through euery prouince in England, that all gentlemen, and men of substance, should be sworne firmely to maintaine according vnto their possible power, all the statutes, Articles and constitutions ordained in the last Parliament. Vnaccustomed oathes.

This yéere the king kept a most royal Christmas, with euery day iustings and running at the tilt, whereunto resorted such a number of people, that there was euery day spent xx tun or xxv. oxen, & thrée hundred shéep, besides fowle without number. Also the king caused a garment for himselfe to be made of gold, siluer, and precious stones, to the value of 3000. markes. 1399. Great Iustings and feastings.

On Newyéeres day, néere vnto Bedford, a very déepe water which ranne betwixt the townes of Swelstone and Harlewood, stode sodainely still and diuided it selfe, so that by the space of thrée miles, the bottom remayned drie, which wonder, many a one thought, did signifie the diuision of the people, and falling away from the king, which happened ſhortly after.

Earle of March ſlaine in Ireland. Cr. Pet. colledge Wil. Wilum.

Roger Mortimer Earle of March, and of Vlſter in Ireland, lying there in a Caſtell of his, there came on him a great multitude of wild Iriſhmen to aſſaile him, and he iſſuing out, fought manfully, til he was by them hewen to peeces, whoſe death the king determined to reuenge.

Duke of Lancaſter deceaſed.

The third of Februarie died Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, at the Biſhop of Elies Inne, in Holborne by London, and was honourably buried in Saint Paules Church at London, by Blanch his firſt wife, his ſonne Henry Duke of Hereford being then beyond the ſeas.

King Richard ſayled into Ireland.

About Whitſontide, king Richard with a Nauie of 200. ſhips, ſailed from Milford hauen, towards Ireland, and arriued at Waterford on the laſt day of may, from whence, he marched with an army of 30000. to Kilkenny, foure ſcore miles within the countrey, and there remained 14. daies, tarrying for Edward Earle of Rutland, Duke of Aumarle, that kept not the right courſe.

Ann. reg. 23.

On Midſommer euen he went from thence towards the countrey of Mackmur, who remayned amongſt the woods with 3000. men, right hardy, and ſuch as ſeemed but little to feare the Engliſhmen. At the entring of the woods, the king commaunded fires to be vſed, ſo that many a houſe, and many a village was brent, & there the king made Henry the Duke of Herefords ſonne knight, who was afterward king Henry the fifth, with tenne other. 2500. pioners were appointed to fell the woods, and make waies for the Engliſhmen. The Iriſhmen feared greatly the ſhot of the Engliſhmen, but yet with their darts they aſſailed, and ſlew diuers as they caught them at aduantage. The vncle of Mackmur came in and yelded himſelfe to the king, with a wythe about his necke, and many other naked and bare-legged, did the like, all which, the king pardoned. After this, the king ſent to Mackmur, promiſing him, that if he would come in as his vncle had done, with the wythe about his necke, he ſhould be pardoned: but he vtterly refuſing, ſaid, he would fight to death in defending his right, for he knew the Engliſhmen wanted victuals, and more then they had brought with them could not be bought for ſiluer or gold. There was already ſuch ſcarcity, that there were ſome foure, ſome fiue, that had but a ſmall loafe of bread to liue by the day, and ſome that eate not a graine in fiue daies together. In this eſtate they remayned eleuen daies, many of their horſes were loſt for lacke of meate. In the meane ſeaſon yet came three ſhippes from Dublin fraught with victuals, for the which was great ſtrife and preaſe eſpecially for the wine of Oſſey and Spayne. The morrow after the K. departed from thence, keeping the hye way toward Dublin, maugre all the noiſe of the enemies: at what time Mackmur ſent a meſſenger with notice to the king that he would be his friend, & aſke him mercy, or els, if it pleaſed him to treat of peace, to ſend ſome noble men to him: whereupon the Earle of Gloceſter was ſent, who led with him the rereward whereof he was Captaine, being two hundred launces, and a thouſand archers, betwixt two woods farre from the ſea in the declining of an hil they met with the Iriſh. Mackmur himſelf rode on a white horſe without ſaddle or other furniture, that coſt him (as was ſaid) foure hundred kine, which horſe he ran down the hil, that ỹ beholders reported they neuer had ſéene bare nor déere to haue runne ſo ſwiftly. In his right hand he bare a dart great and long, which he threw exceeding well. He was a mightie ſtrong man of perſonage. There the Earle and hée talked a good while, about the murthering of the Earle of Parob, and after of other things, but agrée they could not, and ſo departed. Mackmur a good horſman.

The Earle aduertiſed the king what he had found, which was nothing, but that the enemy would cry mercy, ſo as he might be ſure to haue peace without other griefe, otherwiſe, he would (ſo long as he liued) defend himſelfe: wherefore, the king (in his wrath) not knowing what let might happen, ſware, that he would neuer depart Ireland, till he had him either aliue or dead. The hoſte diſlodged for lacke of victuals, they were a thirtie thouſand at their comming ouer, that lay then at Dubline fiftéene daies, the king forthwith diuiding his army into three parts, ſent them out to ſéeke Mackmur, promiſing an hundreth markes to him that could bring him in, which offer was well hearkened vnto, for it ſounded well, but he could not be caught: and the ſame day Edward Earle of Rutland, Duke of Aumale Conſtable of England, arriued with an hundred ſaile, of whoſe comming, the king was very glad, though hée indéed had tarried long, and might haue come much ſooner.

They remayned fiue weékes at Dubline, and heard no newes out of England, the paſſage was ſo daungerous, the wind being contrary, and tempeſts ſo great, at the length came a ſhip with heauie newes, how the Duke of Hereford, and now by the deceaſe of his father [Duke of Lancaſter, was arriued in England at Rauenſpore faſt by Birdlington beſides Wadlington in Yorke ſhire, and had beheaded William Scroope Earle of Wiltſhire, Treaſurer of England, Iohn Buſhy, Henry Greene, and other, and had cauſed Thomas Arundell Archbiſhop of Canterbury to preach againſt king Richard, who alſo ſhewed a Bull procured from Rome, promiſing remiſſion of ſinnes to all thoſe which ſhould aide the ſaid Henry, in conquering of his enemies, and after their death to be placed in paradiſe, which preaching moued many to cleaue to the Duke. The Duke of Hereford returned into England.

Vpon this newes the king being perſwaded to make haſte ouer, the Duke of Aumarle ſaid, it was better to ſtay till his ſhips might be brought together, for there were but an hundreth ready to make ſayle, whereupon Iohn Mountacute Earle of Saliſbury was ſent with a power, whileſt the king going to Waterford might gather his fléete, who promiſed within fiue daies to haue followed him. The Earle of Saliſbury landed at Conwey, where he was ſone aduertiſed, how the Duke had taken the more part of England, and that all the Lords were got to him, with more then threéſcore thouſand men. The Earle of Saliſbury cauſed to ſummon the Welchmen and them of Cheſhire, to come to him, ſo that (weéning the king had béen arriued at Conwey) within foure daies there were come together fortie thouſand men, readie to go againſt the Duke of Hereford, where they ſtayed fourtéen daies, but when they ſaw the king came not, they ſtealed away, & left the Earle of Saliſbury in maner alone, ſo that vnneath he had an hundred men with him. The Duke of Hereford aduanced towards the Earle of Saliſbury, who withdrew him into Conwey. The king through euill counsell staide after the Earles departure 18. daies, and then arriued at Milford hauen, with the Dukes of Aumarle, Excester, and Surrey, and diuers other of the Nobility, with the Bishops of London, Lincolne, and Carlile, & many other, that he might with an army mæte the Duke before he had gotten his aduersers together, but after his comming into England, and vnderstanding the Dukes preparation, he let fall his courage to giue battell, knowing for certain that the people assembled against him, would rather die then giue place, as well for the hatred as feare, which they had conceiued of him: wherfore leauing his army with the Earle of Rutland, Duke of Aumarle, Constable and chiefe gouernour of his army at Milford, went from thence priuily about midnight following, disguised like a Priest, for feare to be knowen, with 14. persons only, who went to Conwey, thinking the Earle of Salisbury had there held the field. There were with him the Dukes of Excester and Surrey, and the Earle of Glocester, that continued faithfull vnto the last houre.

There were three Bishops also, of which, two did not like good men, the Bishop of Lincolne, and Saint Davids, but the third continued faithfull, that was the Bishop of Carlile.

He had also two knights, Stephen Scroope, and William Fireby, and Ianico a Gascoigne. The king rode so warily by nights, that he came to Conwey at the breake of a day. Great sorrow and lamentation was made by the king and the Earle at their mæting, for that the Earles hoste was dispersed and gone, some to the Duke, and some other waies.

The Duke of Aumarle, Constable and chiefe gouernour of the kings army at Milford, immediately when the kings departure was knowne, said vnto the souldiers, let vs shift for our selues masters, for the king is fledde, whereupon euery man trussed and away. Sir Thomas Percy steward of the household, talking with the Constable also departed, and take their way through Wales.

The Welchmen sæing such disorder, assembled them together, and spoyled the Englishmen of all their goods, & sent them packing in their dublets, with white staues in their hands, for there rode, here tenne, here twenty, here fifty, here an hundred, and so the Welchmen comming down the Mountaines, the English lost that they had. The king had many horses of the beyond Sea hoope, and great riches in apparell and iewels, which was in the kæping of sir Thomas Percy, who with the Constable came to Duke Henry of Hereford, and more then fiue hundred of their company, all naked, whom the Welchmen had dispoyled, and beaten well.

The king being at Conwey in great discomfort, sent the Dukes of Excester and Surrey, to Henry Duke of Hereforde and Lancaster, to knowe what his meaning was, himselfe remayning still at Conwey in great perplexity, and with him the Earle of Salisbury, the Bishoppe of Carleile, sir William Ferebe knight, sir Stephen Scroope mine author, and another Frenchman, in all but sixtæne persons, then was newes brought to the king how his Constable had demeaned him, and likewise his Steward, that had caused led his riches to be brought a land, and going through Wales with it, the Welchmen had taken it.

The king then by the aduise of the Earle of Salisbury departed from Conwey vnto Beawmareis, a ten miles off, and from thence, he went to Carnaruan. Beawmareis was a strong Fortresse if it had ben manned & victualled. Carnaruan is a fayre towne, and a strong Castel, but these were vnprouided of al things, so that for fiue or sixe nights he lay very hard and base, and for victuals there was none; wherefore he returned againe to Conwey, where hee sore lamented his estate. The Dukes of Excester & Surrey entring the City of Chester, which Duke Henry had taken, were brought straight to the Castel to the Duke, who was glad to see them as he professed, & forth with asked the Duke of Excester what newes, who told him from point to point, what shame and dishonor it would be to him, if he dealt so vntruly toward his Prince, and that through him he were deposed: he therfore demanded answere with speed: but the Duke of Lancaster was as slowe to dispatch him, and told him hee should not go for one weeke from him, and that the king was not wel aduised to send him and his fellow, being men of such calling, sith he had other inough of meaner estate to do the message: so they remayned to their great discomfort. The Duke of Excester, Duke Henry still kept in his company; but the Duke of Surrey was committed to safe keeping within the Castell of Chester.

There is a Castel sixe miles from Chester, called Beston Castell, builded on a rocke, very strong by situation, therein were an hundred men of armes chosen and able men, but not valiant, or faithfull to king Richard, for they deliuered it to the Duke, where they might well inough haue kept it, the ascending is so steepe: it was victualled for sixe yeeres. There was found within it coyne better worth then an hundred thousand markes, beside other iewels, which king Richard caused to be kept, to the value of two hundred thousand markes, all which Duke Henry toke with him, and returned to Chester, and there taking counsell of his friends what was best to be done, the Archbishop of Canterbury toke vpon him to speake, and said: that sith the king was in Wales, which was a countrey strong by reason of the Mountaines, so that it was impossible for an army to passe with bagge and baggage, he thought it best to send vnto king Richard, & to make him beleeue that he sought nothing but peace and a Parliament to be made, wherein, those that had offended in putting to death his vncle the Duke of Gloucester, should be punished, and so from thencefoorth the king and the Duke to be good friends, and that it should be at the kings pleasure to appoint the day and place for this Parliament; for without this shift, it should be impossible for the Duke to get him into his hands, for he might depart to sea whē he would, hauing retained at Conwey ships for that purpose.

All the other Lords assenting to this counsel, the Duke appointed the Earle of Northumberland to go to the king with foure hundred launces, and a thousand archers, which Earle, when he came to Flint castel, had it deliuered to his hands: from thence he hasted to Rudland, which was also giuen ouer to him: this Rudland is but tenne miles from Conwey, where the king was, greatly marualling, that hée heard nothing of his brother the Duke of Excester, being now eight daies since he was sent to the Duke of Hereford. The Earle of Northumberland laid vnder a rocke, nére to the Castell of Rudland two great ambushments of his people, with commandement to kéepe that passage. Then he went with fiue other in his company and went by the sea coast, till he came before the town of Conwey, and then he sent an Herault to the king for a safe conduct, to come to his présence, to declare his message from the D. about an agréement, which safe conduct being granted, he passed the water, and entred the Castel of Conwey, where he found the K. and the Earle of Salisbury, he declared to them that peace would be made if he would be a good Iudge & a true, and cause those that should be named, to be tryed by Iustice at a certaine day of Parliament at Westminster, which he and the Duke should hold together, and that the Duke might kéepe his place of high Iudge as his father and other ancestors before him had done, for the space of one hundred yéeres. Those that he would haue to be tried by the law, were the Duke of Excester, the Duke of Serrey, the Earle of Salisbury, the bishop of Carleile and Tho. Marke, which fiue, had giuen the K. counsel to put his vncle the Duke of Glocester to death, and then if it should please him to pardon the Duke his wrath, he would be ready to come to him on his knées to aske him mercy, and so they might go to London together, or the one one way, and the other another. The Earle offered to sweare that all this should be performed, and that the Duke had assured him by oth to stand to it. The King liking well that it should be at his liberty to go, eyther in company with the Duke, or alone vnto London, purposed to take the offer, and so to pretend some excuse for his going alone, after hée should méet with the Duke: as lacke of victuals or such like, and so to take a by-way thorow Wales, and there to raise a power, for hée promised the Lords neuer to suffer them to come to iudgement, discoursing with them, how hée would auoid all the daunger, and surely hée reuenged vpon his enemies, namely on Duke Henry of Lancaster, who with the rest should die for it, hée accorded to go to the Duke, and then (Masse béeing celebrated) the Earl of Northumberland sware vpon the hoast, that the Duke should hold all that hée had told the King. The Earle hasted the King forward to horsebacke, but the King prayed the Earle to go before vnto Rutland, there to prepare dinner. The Earle rode a pace vntill hée came where hée might sée his people vnder the mountaine, whom hée much commended for obseruing his commaundement.

King Richard betrayd.

The King passing the water rode a foure miles before hée came to the rocke where when he saw the ambushes he was sore abashed, knowing wel hée was betrayed by the Earle, for he was in such a place as he could not escape. The sea beating on the one side, and the rocke kéeping him in on the other, and if hée should haue fled backe, they would haue caught him, ere hée could haue come to Conwey, for hée had not past thrée and twenty in all of his company. The King descending the rocke, the Earle came, and kneeling down, excused the matter, saying, he had caused those people to come to guard his person, but the King told him, fewer would haue serued, and that it was contrary to his oth, for he had promised to haue but fiue in his compsny, and said therefore that he would goe backe to Conwey, but the Earle answered, that nowe sith he had him, he would leade him to the Duke as he had promised tenne dayes since, and so he caused bread and wine to be brought and offered the King, who durst not refuse it, and after leaping on horsebacke againe they rode to Rutland to dinner, and after to Flint, where they lay that night. Rutland. Flint.

The morrowe being the two and twentieth day of August, the King got him to the Castle walles, where he beheld the Duke with all his hoste of an hundred thousand men comming by the sands: there came before that were departed from the army, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Sir Thomas Percy, and the Earle of Rutland from whom the duke had taken the office of Constable, more for a colour, then for displeasure, for they bare the Dukes order, and not the hart, which was the Kings, the Archbishop entred first, and after the other with a great traine, they went vp to the dungeon, and then the King came downe from the walles, vnto whom they did reuerence lowly on their knées, the King toke them vp, and drew the Archbishop apart, and they two talked long together, but the Earle of Rutland kepte him aloofe. They toke horsse againe, and rode towards the Duke that nowe was approching nére.

The King went vp againe to the walles, lamenting sore when he saw the Dukes hoste within two lowe shotes of the Castle, who compassed it round about downe to the sea. The Earle of Northumberland went forth to the Duke, who after long talke, concluded, that the Duke should not enter the Castle before the King had dined, for he was fasting: so the Earle returned, and the King was set to dinner, with whom sate his assured friends the Earle of Salisbury, and the Bishop of Carleile, Sir Stephen Scrope, and Feribe, they sate long and eate little, for they had no haste to rise.

After dinner the Duke entred the Castle all armed, his basenet excepted. King Richard came downe to méete the Duke, who as soone as he sawe the King, fell downe on his knées, and comming nére vnto him, he knéeled the second time with his hat in his hand, and the King then put off his hoode, and spake first, faire cousin of Lancaster ye are right welcome. The Duke bowing lowe to the ground answered, my Lord, I am come before you sent for me, the reason why I will shewe you. The common fame among your people is such, that ye haue for the space of twentie or xxii. yéeres, ruled them very rigorously, but if it please our Lord I will helpe you to gouerne better. The King answered, faire Cousin of Lancaster, sith it pleaseth you, it pleaseth me well.

The Duke spake as ye haue heard to the King, he spake also to the Bishop of Carlile, to Sir Steuen Scrope, and to Feribe, but to the Earle of Salisbury he spake not, whereby the Earle perceiued that the Duke hated him deadly.

The Duke with a high sharpe voyce, bad bring forth the Kings horses, and then two little nagges not worth fourtie franks, were brought forth, the king was set on the one, and the Earle of Salisburie on the other: and thus the Duke brought the king from Flint to Chester, where he was deliuered to the Chester.

Duke

Duke of Glocesters sonne, and to the Earle of Arundels sonne that loued him but a little, for he had put their fathers to death, who ledde him straight to the Castle.

The third day they went from Chester to Nantwich, and the next day to Newcastle, and there the Earle of Warwicks son met them, and so iourneying forth, the next day they came to Stafford, and after they departed to Lichfield, where the King thought to haue escaped, slipping downe into a Garden out of a Window of a great Towre, but he was espyed and thrust into the Tower againe: from Lichfield the Duke went to Couentrie, but before they could come thither, the Welchmen did them much harme and slewe many of them, and the Englishmen, when they by great chaunce could take any of the Welchmen, they tied them to their horse tayles, and drewe them after them, through wayes full of stones, and caused them to dye miserably.

Wadensors call'd Turlupins.

The Duke passed from Couentrie to Deintrie, the next day to Northampton, from thence to Dunstable, and then to Saint Albons, and a fiue or sixe miles before his comming to London, the Maior and the Companies in their liueries, with great noyse of Trumpets met the Duke, doing more reuerence to him then to the King, reioycing that God had sent them such a Prince, that had conquered the Realme within one moneths space.

When the Duke came within two miles of the Citie, the Duke caused the host to stay, and then said to the commons of the Citie: My Masters, beholde here your King, consider what ye will doe with him. They answered, they would he should be led to Westminster, whereupon he was deliuered vnto them, and they led him to Westminster, and from thence by water to the Tower of London.

The Duke entred into London by the chiefe gate, and rode through Cheap to Saint Pauls, where he was after lodged in the Bishops pallace fiue or sixe dayes, and after at Saint Iohns without Smithfield, where he remayned fifténe dayes, from thence he remoued to Hertford, where he abode three weeks, and then came backe to London, to holde the Parliament that began the first Wednesday of October in Westminster hall, which they had hung and trimmed sumptuously, and had caused to be set vp a royall chaire, in purpose to chose a newe King, néere to the which the Prelates were set, and on the other side sate the Lords, and after the commons in order, first sate the Duke of Lancaster, then Edmond of Langley the Duke of Yorke, the Duke of Aumarle, the Duke of Surrey, the Duke of Exceter, and the Marques Dorset, then in order the Earles of Arundale, Norffolke, March, Stafford, Penbroke, Salisburie and Deuonshire, the Earles of Northumberland and Westmerland sate not, but went vp and downe, and oftentimes knéeled as it fell in doing their offices.

Parliament in Westminster Hall.

The Archbishop of Canterbury made a Sermon and toke for his Theame, Habuit Iacob benedictionem à patre suo, which Sermon being ended in Latin, a Doctour of the Law, stode vp and read an instrument, in the which was contained, that King Richard had by his owne confession disabled himselfe to be worthy to raigne, and that he would resigne the crowne to such a one as was sufficient to rule. This instrument being read, the Archbishop perswaded them to proceede to the election of a new King, and perceiuing they were all contented, for there were not past foure persons that were of King Richards part (and they durst say nothing) he asked each of them whom they would haue to their King, whether the Duke of Yorke or not: and they answered no: he asked if they would haue his eldest sonne the Duke of Aumarle: and they said no: he asked if they would haue his yongest sonne, and they said no: and so of diuers other: then staying a while, he asked if they would haue the Duke of Lancaster, and then they answered they would none other. This demaund being made thrice, they drew certaine instruments and charters, and read them in presence of all that were there. Then the Archbishops comming to the Duke, fell on their knées declaring to him how he was chosen King, and willed him to take regard if he would consent thereto. Then the Duke being on his knées rose and declared that he accepted the realme, sith it was ordayned by God. Then the Archbishop read what the new King was bound vnto, and with certaine ceremonies signed him with the crosse, then he kissed the Archbishop, and they toke the ring, with which the Kings be wedded to the Realme, and bare it to the Lord Percy, that was Constable, who receiuing it, shewed it to all the assembly, and then put it on the Kings finger, the King then kissed the Constable, and then the Archbishops led him to the siege Royall, and the King made his prayers on his knées before it, and after spake vnto them all, first to the Prelats, and then to the Lords and all other, and so set him downe in the seate: and thus he was inuested, and King Richard put downe, he sate a good while and kept silence, and so did al the rest; for they were in prayer for his prosperitie in his gouernment, and when they had ended, where the offices were voide, the King created the Lord Percy Constable, and toke him the staffe: Then was chosen Ralph Earle of Westmerland Marshall, Iohn Scirle, or Serle Chancellor, Sir Richard Clifford keeper of the priuie Seale, and many other officers were newly confirmed. After this the Archbishop spake certaine things in latine, praying for the Kings prosperitie, and the Realmes, and after spake in English vpon this following: Vir dominabitur in populo. reg. 9. &c. And then exhorting all there present to pray the like, euery man sate downe. Then the King rose and made his eldest sonne Prince of Wales, then the Lords were sworne to be true to the Prince as before they had done to his father: his second sonne was there made Duke of Lancaster. Thus was king Richard deposed when he had raigned 22. yéeres, 3. moneths, and odde dayes, in such sort as ye haue heard, whose royaltie had bin such, that wheresoeuer he lay, his person was guarded by 200. Cheshire men, he had about him 13. Bishops, besides Barons, Knights, Esquiers, and other moe then néeded, insomuch that to the household came euery day to meate 10000. people, as appeared by the melles told out of the kitching to 300. seruiters, &c. He was murdered on the 14. of Februarie next following, as shall be shewed in place conuenient, and was buried first in the Church of the Friers preachers at Langley besides Saint Albanes. And after by commaundement of King Henry the fift, remoued to Westminster.

Henry

Ann.reg.1. HEnry Plantagenet borne at Bolingbroke, in Lincolnshire, sonne to Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, was ordeyned King of England, more by force then by lawfull succession or election: he began his raigne the 29. of September, in the yeere of our Lord God 1399. He forthwith made new officers, to wit Thomas his second sonne steward of England: Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, Constable of England: Ralph Neuill Earle of Westmerland, Marshall of England: Sir Iohn Scerle Chancellour of England, Sir Richard Clifford keeper of his priuie seale: Iohn Norbury Esquire Treasurour, Thomas Chaucer Constable of Wallingford Castle, & other officers, and then was crowned at Westminster ỳ 13. of October, by Thomas Arundale Archbishop of Canterbury: The Dukes of Yorke, Surrey, Aumarle, and the Erle of Glocester bare ỳ Canopie ouer him. Sir Thomas Dimmocke was champion, and rode three times about the hall. This was a noble and valiant Prince, and after the ciuill warres were appeased, shewed himselfe louing to his subiects. He made Henry his sonne Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, Earle of Chester, and heire apparant to the crowne of England.

Wencoslaus deposed

After the solemnitie of the coronation, the Lords and commons straight proceeded to the Parliament. In which it was inquired out of the death of ỳ duke of Glocester, and howe he had been murdered at Caleis by the Duke of Norfolke, vpon the Kings commandement. King Henry created his eldest sonne Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornewall, Earle of Chester, and Duke of Aquitaine. In this Parliament it was ordeined that the statutes made in the Parliament holden in the 21. yeere of king Richard at Westminster, and after proroged vnto Shrewsbury, with all the circumstances to be disanulled, reuoked, made voyde, & vtterly blotted out. Also that the Parliament holden at Westminster, in the 11. yeere of king Richard, be holden firme and stable. Also that the Lords and other persons which were iudged forth in the Parliament holden the 21. yeere of King Richard, and their heires that be dead, should be wholy restored to their possessions without any suing liuerie thereof to be made, excepted that the Lords and other shall haue nothing of the issues receiued in the meane time. The King gaue to the Earle of Northumberland the Ile of Man, to beholden of the king by seruice, to beare the sword with which he entred into England. And to the Earle of Westmerland he gaue the Countie of Richmond. Also iudgement was giuen against the Appellants of the Duke of Glocester in this manner: the Lords in this present Parliament by the kings assent, iudge that the Dukes, of Aumarle, Surrey, and Excester now present and were appellants, shal lose their names of Dukes and honours from henceforth, together with the dignities, of Dukes, and that the Marques Dorset that is present, lose his name of Marques, and the Earle of Glocester, which is lose his name for him and his heires, as the above named persons doe theirs, and that al the Castles, possessions or manors which they had of them that belonged to those whom they appealed from the day of the arrest of the Duke of Glocester, and the other Lords, or after at any time, simply and without favour or mercy, they shall lose them: and that all other Castles, possessions, manors, Lordships, dominions and liberties, which they held of the Kings gift, that day or after should rest in the Kings grace from that houre, and that all letters patents and charters, which they or any of them had of the said names, Castles, Dominions, possessions, and liberties should be surrendred up into the Chancery, there to be cancelled, and that they stand in state which they had in name and possession before the said day of the said arrest.

The King to shew to all men in all Countries about by what right and title he had taken upon him the crowne and realme, sent Embassadours to Rome, John Treneuant Bishop of Hereford, John Cheyne Knights, & John Cheyne Esquire. Into France he sent Walter Tricklow Bishop of Durham, Thomas Percy Earle of Worcester, and William Heron. Into Spaine John Trenor Bishop of S. Dauids, and Sir William Par Knight: Into Almaine the Bishop of Bangor with other. Messengers sent into diuers countries, to declare the cause of deposing of King Richard.

The Scottes in time of the Parliament taking occasion by the absence of the Northren Lords, and because the same time the North parts were sore oppressed by a great Pestilence entred as enemies, and toke the Castle of Warke, and kept the same a certaine time, but at length spoyled and vterly ruinated it, and many other mischiefes they did in the Countrey. Thomas Moubrey Duke of Norfolke, which was exiled, dyed at Venice, in his returne from Jerusalem. Also the Duches of Glocester dyed, and her sonne and heire Humfrey dyed of the Pestilence when he was sent for forth of Ireland. Castell of Warke taken by the Scots. D. of Norfolke deceased.

The King held his feast of Christmasse in his Castle of Windsor, where John Holland late Duke of Exceter and Earle of Huntington, Thomas Holland late Duke of Surrey & Earle of Kent, Edmond late Duke of Aumarle, and Earle of Rutland, son to the Duke of Yorke, John Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, Thomas Spencer, Sir Ralph Lumly, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Benedict Cely Knights, with others that fauoured King Richard conspired against King Henry, and appointed priuily to murder him, vnder the colour of Iusting and other pastimes pretended. And the time approching of their purpose, they sent messengers to London with letters to the Duke of Aumarle, that he should not faile to come at that day appointed with his company, to helpe to doe the feate whereunto he was sworne: but his minde being altered, he bare the letters straight to his Father the Duke of Yorke, who caused a number of his men forthwith to carry his son to the King, where he shewing his letters, the King would not beleeue them: but the same morning came the Maior of London to the Court, and informed him of the matter, whereupon the King made no tarriance, but got him forth toward London, in company of the Maior and other. But before the King could gette London on his backe, his enemies came to Windsore, and there entred the Castle with an armed band 1400. Conspiracy against King Henry. After this they came to Faringdon, in the Vale of White Horse in Barkeshire, and the same day to Circester, on the xii. day late in the euening, and there harbored, with a great number of men of armes and many archers: there they vsed that K. Richard was escaped forth of prison, and that he was there with them, & to make their wordes to haue the more credite, they had got a Chaplein of K. Richards called Maudelen, so like to him in all proportion and fauour, that one could vneth be discerned from the other: many times (saith mine author) I haue seene him in Ireland ride with the king his master: so faire a Priest and goodly a person, I had not lightly seene. They put him in armour with a crowne on his Helmet, so as all men might take him for king Richard. On the morrow being Wednesday, the people of that town misliking of their procedinges, fought against them, and at length tooke the chiefest of them, and ledde them to the Abbey there, and put them in a faire chamber, vnder safe custody. And on the Thursday the sayd Lordes, fearing the people, imagined how to escape out of their handes, and caused some of their seruantes to sette fire on certaine houses in the Towne, thinking that therevpon the people would depart from them, and seeke to staunch the fire: but it chaunced contrary, for the people turned into marueylous rage against them, ranne vpon them with great violence, and drewe them into the market place, and there they beheaded Iohn Holland the Duke of Excester, Thomas Holland the Duke of Surrey, and the Earle of Salisburie, the third day after the Epiphanie: their seruants that were with them, were by and by taken and as prisoners bound and brought to Oxford, and on Monday following were beheaded in the Castell there, to the number of fiue and twentie persons. Also Sir Thomas Blunt Knight was beheaded with them. The weke next following was beheaded Tho Spencer Earle of Glocester at Bristow: not long after was Sir Barnard Brocas beheaded at London, and a Priest named Iohn Maudelen, that was like king Richard, and another Priest called William Ferbe. The Bishop of Carlile was impeached and condemned of conspiracie, but was pardoned.

Maudel a Priest counterfeited King Richard.

Blanke Charters burnt.

King Richard was imprisoned in Pomfrait Castle, where xv. dayes and nights they vexed him with continuall hunger, thirst and cold, and finally bereft him of his life, with such a kinde of death as neuer before that time was knowen in England (saith Sir Iohn Fortiscue.) He died the xiiii. day of Februarie, whose body was brought to ỹ Towne of London, and so through the City to Pauls Church barefaced, where he stood three dayes for all beholders and and had seruice, where King Henry was present. From thence he was caried to Langley, and there buried in the Church of the Friers Preachers. Upon his death the famous and excellent Poet Iohn Gower, wrote certaine verses, which may be englished thus.

About this time one Berthold Schwartz Monk & Alchymist invents Gunpowder

O Mirrour for the world meete, which shouldst in Golde be sette,
By which all wise men, by foresight, their prudent wittes may whette:
Lo, God doth hate such rulers, as here viciously doe liue:
And none ought rule, that by their life,
doe ill example giue.
And this King Richard witnesseth well, his end this plaine doth shewe:
For God allotted him such ende, and sent him so greate woe,
As such a life deserude: as by the Chronicles thou mayst knowe.

The king with a great army went into Scotland, spoyled the countrey and returned to Yorke, where two Knights, the one a Frenchman, the other an Italian challenged to fight within lists against Sir Iohn Cornwall, and Iames of Artois, which two strangers were ouercome in battaile, and Sir Iohn Cornwall obtayning the kings fauour, married the kings sister, that had been wife to Sir Iohn Holland Earle of Huntington.

The Welchmen taking occasion by the kings absence when he was in Scotland, began to rebel, by the setting on of Owen Glendouerdew sonne to Griffith Vicham an Esquire of Wales, and so called Glendour, because his dwelling was in a place called Glendordwy, for Glyn in Welch is a vale, and Dor is water, because the place was in a dale, at the side of the water or riuer of Dew in ỹ parish of Corwen, in the countie of Merioneth in Northwales. He serued King Richard, at the time of his oppression by Henry Duke of Lancaster at Flint Castle.

The Welchmen rebell. Owen Glendouerdew.

The first cause of this stirre was about a piece of land in controuersie betwixt him and the Lord Reignold Gray of Ruthine, for when he saw his cause not fauoured, first he began to spoyle the lands of the said Lord Gray, whereof the king being certified, went with an army into Wales: but the Welchmen fled to the mountaines, the King brent the countrey, slue the people with whom he met, and returned with a great pray of cattell.

The famous Poet Geffrey Chaucer esquire, the first illuminer of our English language, deceased. This was a worshipful Gentleman, and of faire possessions, whose abode was chiefly about Woodstocke, (where he had a faire mãnor) and New elme (in Orfordshire) which also was his, with diuers other manors: he was oft times imployed by K. Of which Dutches loke more in Henry the 6. the 28. of his reigne: but our first named Chaucer the poet, by what occasion I know not, was buried at Westminster, his workes for the most part are extant, first published in print by William Caxton, sometime a mercer of London, the man that first brought the Art of printing into this lande, since more largely collected into one volume by William boteuil, aliàs Thin, Esquier, chiefe Clearke of the Kitchin, and maister of the household to K. The which volume was since againe, to wit, in Anno 1560. by vewe of diuers written copies, corrected by my selfe, the author of this history, who at that time also corrected and added diuers workes of the said master Geffrey Chaucers neuer before imprinted, and againe in the yeere 1597. further increased with other his workes, as also his life, preferment, issue and death, collected out of records in the towre and else where by my selfe, and giuen to Thomas Spight to be published, and was performed. Besides the history of Oedipus and Iocasta, with the siege of Thebes, translated and made into English verse, by Don Iohn Lidgate, a disciple of the said Chaucers.

Not long after deceased the like famous Poet Maister Iohn Gower, a man not much vnlike the other in excellency of wit, learning, or possessions, he builded a great part of S. Mary Oueries Church in Southwarke, then newe edified. On the North side of the which Church he prepared for his bones a resting place, where somewhat after the olde fashion he lyeth right sumptuously buried in a tombe of stone, with his image also of stone lying ouer him, ỹ haire of his head awburne long to his shoulders, and curling vp, a smal forked beard, and on his head a garland or Chaplet of roses red, foure in number, an habite of purple damasked downe to his feete, a Coller of Esses gold about his necke, vnder his head the likenesse of three bookes, which he compiled: the first, Speculum meditantis in French, the second Vox clamantis in Latine, the third Confessio amantis in English, which last named booke is extant in print, ỹ second I haue faire written, but the first I haue not seene, his tombe arched, was beautified with his armes, and the likenes of Angels with posies in latine. Besides in the the wall were painted three virgins crowned, one of the which was written Charity, and held this deuise. En toy qui filz de Dieu le pere sauue soit, qui giſt soubs ceſte pierre. The second Mercie, with this deuise: O bon Ieſu fait ta mercie alme dont le corps giſt ioy. The third Pitie, with this deuise. Pour ta pite Ieſu regard, Et met ceſt alme in ſauuegarde.

All which is now washed out, and the image defaced, by cutting off the nose and striking off his hands, because they were eleuated towards heauen. Ann. reg. 2.

The Emperour of Constantinople, came into England, to require ayde against the Turkes, whom the King with sumptuous preparation met at Blackheath, vpon S. Thomas day the Apostle, and brought him to London, and paying for the charges of his lodging, presented him with gifts worthy for one of so high degree. Emperour of Constantinople came into England.

Sone after came newes, that the King of Leto had slaine in battel Bassacke the son of the noble Balthazaradan, and destroyed Ierusalem, and all the countrey round about. And because he had by Gods grace so ouercome contrary to his opinion, he became christened and 60000. men of his sect. 1401.

The Emperour of Constantinople hearing this, was very glad, and departed out of England, being honoured by the King with precious giftes. A Parliament was holden at London, after the feast of the Epiphanie, in the which Parliament a statute was enacted for Lollards, that whersoeuer they were knowen to preach their false and corrupt doctrine, (so termed at that time) they should be taken, & deliuered to the Bishop of the diocesse, before whom, if they would presume stoutly to defend their erroneous opinions, they should be disgraded, & committed to the secular iurisdiction to be executed, which law was first put in practise vpon a Priest named Wil. Sawtry, which was burnt in Smithfield, in the presence of many a man. Simon Burley was restored in blod & inheritance, except the lands giuen to the abbey of Grace by the towne of London, to S. Stephans at Westminster, and the Friers at Langley. Parliament at London.

The 8. day of Aprill deceased Thomas Beawchampe Earle of Warwike, and shortly after deceased Iohn Botelsham Bishop of Rochester.

The fiue and twentieth day of July Isabel late wife to King Richard, not yet twelue yeres of age, departed from Douer towards Caleis, and so into France to her father, well and honorably accompanied. Where when she was arriued, Hugueuell that had been sent for her into England, aduertised the commissioners then remayning at Bulloigne. She was conueyed from Caleis by the Englishmen that accompanied her to Lalingham, where the Earle of S. Paul mette her, and the French Ambassadours: she alighted from her horse beneath Lolingham, the French Ladies came to her, and brought her to the Chappell, before the Ambassadours of both Realmes, and there Sir Henry Percy protested, that the King of England his master had sent her to be deliuered to her father cleare of all bonds of mariage, or otherwise, and that he would take it on his soule, that she was sound and intire, euen as she was the same day she was deliuered to King Richard, and if any would say to the contrary, he was ready to proue it against him by Combat, but the Earle of S. Paul, saying he beleeued it to be true, the Lord Percy toke her by the hand Isabel late wife to King Richard returned into France.

K. Henry escapeth great danger.

There was found in the Kings bed clothes, an yron with 3. sharpe pikes, slender and round standing vpright, laid there by some traytor, that when the King should haue laid him downe, he might haue thrust himselfe vpon them.

This time was vsed exceeding pride in garments, gownes with deepe and broade sleeues, commonly called poke sleeues, the seruants ware the as well as their maisters, which might wel haue bin called receptacles of ỹ deuil, for what they stole, they hid in their sleeues, whereof some hung downe to the ferte, and at least to the knees, full of cuts & iagges, whereupon were made these verses.

From the feast of the Epiphany till the midst of Aprill appeared a blazing Starre, first betwixt the East and the North, and last of all putting fierie beames toward the North, foreshewing peraduenture the effusion of blood, about the parts of Wales and Northumberland.

Conspiracie against King Henrie.

Certaine men affirmed King Richard to be aliue, and that he should shortly shew himselfe openly, and reward them that were faithfull vnto him. But after a certaine priest was taken at Warwicke, who had written the names of many, which were the authors of these troubles, both the hope and feare of this conspiracie vanished. The Priest was drawen, hanged and quartered. Also Walter Waldocke late Priour of Laude a Priorie in Leicestershire, because he confessed he knew euil against the king and did conceale it, was likewise hanged and headed. Moreouer certaine gray Friers were taken, of the which one Richard Friseby, Doctour of Diuinitie, being asked what he would do if King Richard were present, answered, that he would fight in his quarrell against any man, euen to the death, wherefore he was condemned, drawen, and hanged in his religious habite and weede.

A stoute Frier executed.

The diuell appeared in likenes of a Frier.

At Dancburie in Esser, vpon Corpus Christi day, the deuill appeared in likenesse of a gray Frier, who entring the Church, raged insolently, to the great feare of the Parishoners: and the same houre with a tempest of whirlewind and thunder, the top of the Steeple was broken downe, and halfe the Chauncell scattered abroad.

Shortly

Shortly after, Sir Roger Claringdon knight, a bastard sonne of Edward the blacke Prince, and with him a Squire and a Yeoman were beheaded, and eyght gray Friers hanged and beheaded at London, and two at Leicester, all which had published King Richard to be aliue. All Priories alliens with their possessions were resumed and seized into the Kings hands, except such houses as were conuentuals.

Owen Glendouerdew, with a company of Welchmen inuaded all the shires that bordered nere vnto him, wherefore Sir Edmond Mortimer with many knights and esquires went out to encounter with Owen, stronger then he was of the Country: but when it came to martiall affaires, their owne Archers turned their hands against them whom they should haue defended. There were slaine aboue eleuen hundred of our men. Sir Edmond Mortimer was taken, and the Welch women, when the battayle was done vsing the dead carcasses to shamefully to be spoken, would not suffer them to be buried without great ransome. This battayle was fought at Pelale in Wales. The King was not hasty to purchase the deliuerance of the Earle of March, because his title to the crowne was wel known, but suffred him to remaine in prison.

The K. went with a great power into Wales to pursue Owen Glendouerdewe, where he profited nothing, but lost much, for the Welchmen conueyed themselues into vnknowen places: wherefore the king constrained by necessitie, returned into England, after he had spoyled and brent the country.

King Henry went into Wales to pursue Owen Glendouerdewe.

Edmond of Langley Duke of Yorke deceased, and was buryed at Langley, with his brethren, nere vnto his wife daughter to King Peter of Spaine.

The same time the Scottes cruelly entred into England, for they supposed all the Lords beyond Humber to be occupyed in the parties of Wales: but the Earles of Northumberland, Henry Percy, and his sonne Henry with the earle of Dunbarre, (that a good while agone hauing forsaken the Scottes, had sworne to be true to the King of England) with a number of armed men and plentie of archers, sodainely came to resist the Scottes, as they would haue returned home, after they had spoyled and brent the Country; but now vpon a sodaine their way was forelaid, so that they must nedes abide and take a place to fight vpon: they chose therefore a mountaine nere to the Towne of Wollor, called Halydowne hill, in the which they place themselues with their armed men & archers, which when our men beheld, leauing the way in which they stode against the Scots, they clime the hill that stode ouer against the Scots, and without delay of time, our archers placed in the valley, set their arrowes against the Scots battell, that they might by some meanes force them to come downe: on the other side, the Scottish archers let flie at our men, who yet after they felt the grieuous waight, and as it had been a shower or tempest of the arrowes, shot by the Englishmen, they fledde. The Earle Dowglas perceiuing his men so to flee, for he was their generall leader, toke his speare, and manfully with a multitude came downe the hill, trusting doubtlesse in his armour and armour of his complices that had been three yeres in making, and forced himselfe to runne vpon the archers, which when the archers saw, they stepped backe, and shotte so fiercely, that they pierced the armed mens bodies, stroke through their Helmets, riued their speares, and rent their armour with light adoe. Earle Dowglas himselfe was wounded in fiue places, the residue of the Scottes that were not come beside the hill, turning backe from the arrowes that flew, fledde away, but their flight nothing auayled them whilest the archers followed them. but that they were compelled to yeeld themselues. Earle Dowglas also was taken, and many drowned in the riuer of Twéde, whilest they knew not the fordes, to the number of fiue hundred (as was sayd.) In this battell no Lord, nor knight, no esquire, gaue any stroke to the enemies, but onely God gaue the victorie to the English archers, the Lordes and armed men being onely lookers on.

That day the flowre of the Scottish Chiualry was taken, to wit, the earle Dowglas, Murdake the eldest son of the Duke of Albanie, that was heyre apparant to the Realme of Scotland: the earles of Murrey, Angus, and Orkeney, the Lords of Mountgomerie, Erskyn, & Gram, with many other knights to the number of foure score, besides Esquires and yeomen, whose number was not knowne. There were slaine of barons, the Lord Gordon, the Lord Iohn of Swinton that was false to both the Realmes, &c. This battell was fought on the fourteenth of September.

A Parliament at London. In a Parliament at London, which began the morrow after Michaelmas day, and lasted seuen weekes, there was granted to the King a tenth and a half of the clergie, a tenth of the borough townes, and a fifteenth of the commons through the Realme.

1403. The messengers that had bin sent for Ioan, late wife to Iohn of Mountford Duke of Brytaine returned with her into England, and landed at Falmouth in Cornewall. The King met with her at Winchester the seuenth of February, where they were married in the Church of S. Swithen.

King Henry married the Lady Ioan de Nauarre.

The 26. of February, she was crowned at Westminster.

Monstrous sights at Bedford. In the summer following, by the Townes of Bedford and of Buckleward, monsters were séene oft-times mornings and euenings to come out of the woodes, vnder diuers colours, in the likenesse and similitude of men of war, which met one with another, and séemed to fight cruell battels, which although they that were a farre off might sée, yet they that were nére hand could not sée nor finde, which thing deceiued many that coueted to approch and come nére.

Henry Percy the yonger, did sodainely shewe himselfe to be the Kings enemie, vnto whom ioyned Thomas Percy Earle of Worcester, vncle to the said Henry: and to make their conspiracie excusable, they did write vnto the shires about, that they pretended nothing against the allegiance nor fidelitie which they ought to the king, neither to gather to any other end an armie, but onely for the sauing of their persons, and for the better gouernement of the common wealth, because the payments and taskes granted to the king for the safe custodie of the realme, were put to such vses as they ought not to be, and were vnprofitably consumed and wasted.

Moreouer, they complained: that because of the euill slaunders which their enemies had made of them, they durst not personally appeare in the kings presence, vntill the prelates and barons had intreated for them, that they might be permitted to purge themselues before the king, and be lawfully iudged by their peeres, so that many that saw these letters, did praise their diligence, and extoll their fidelitie towards the common wealth. But the king being disquieted with these doings, that he might appease the communaltie, he wrote to them, that he marueiled much, that seeing the Earle of Northumberland, and Henry his son had receiued the most part of the payments and summes granted to him by the cleargy and communaltie, for the defence of the Marches of Scotland, what occasion they had to make such manifest slaunders &c. But the yong Henry Percy putting his confidence in the aide of Owen Glendouerdew, and Edmond Mortimer Earle of March, with the Welchmen, and men of Chesshire, published that king Richard was aliue, and was with them, whom if any man would see, they should without delay come in armour vnto the Castle of Leicester, which declaration made diuers variable motions in the hearts of many, and caused them to wauer.

King Henry considering all things wisely, gathered together as many as he could, and came sodainly into the partes where the rebles kept their rage, and when Henry saw vpon a sodaine the kings banner, and was euen ready to haue scaled the towne of Shrewsbury, he straightwayes desisted from the assault of the towne, and said to his men, we must now needes turne our weapons vpon them that come against vs: ye see the Kings standert, neither can we, though we would, seeke any startinghole: stand to it manfully therefore, for this day shall either bring vs all to promotion and honor, if we ouercome, or else if we be ouercome, it shall deliuer vs from the kings malice. For it is a more comly thing to die in battell for the common wealth, then after battell to die by the sentence of condemnation by the enemie: and with that, 14000. of the best men that were with Henry, made bowe & promise to stand by him so long as breath would serue, and they toke the field that was commodious for them, and the king and his men lay in the field right against them. The bowmen of Henry Percy began ỹ battel, whose arrowes fell not vpon the ground, but vpon the bodies of the kings souldiers, & the kings archers shot as fiercely against their enemies, so that on both sides many were slaine, and many thousands fled, thinking the king had been slaine: but the Earle of Dunbar withdrew the king from the place that he stode in, which was a god turne for him, for the aforesaid Henry Percy, and Earle Dowglas the Scot (then whom was neuer man more stout) raged so, that the kings standert was ouerthrowen, & those about it slaine, among whom was slaine Edmond Earle of Stafford, sir Walter Blunt ỹ kings standert-bearer, Sir Nicholas Langford, Sir Iohn Cokaine, Sir Iohn Caluerley, Sir Iohn Massy, Baron of Podington, Sir Hugh Mortimer, Sir Iohn Clifton, & the two brethren Nicholas and Robert Genetels, with many other knights and Gentlemen, and of the commons on both

In the meane season Henry Percy whilest he went before his men in the battel, pressing vpon his enemies, was sodainly slaine, which being knowne, the kings enemies fled, but the Earle Dowglas was taken, and also Thomas Percy Earle of Worcester, with Sir Richard Vernon, and the baron of Kinderton, and many other were taken. This battel was fought on Mary Magdalens eue, neere vnto Shrewsbury, in a place called Old field, alias Bull field, not farre from a place called Barwike. On the Monday following, were condemned and beheaded at Shrewesbury the Earle of Worcester, the Baron of Kinderton, and Sir Richard Vernon. The body of Henry Percy was deliuered to the Lord of Furniuale to be buried, but the king caused the same body to be taken vp, and to be reposed betweene two Millstones in the Towne of Shrewsbury, there to be kept with armed men, and afterward to be beheaded and quartered, commaunding his head and quarters to be carried vnto diuers Cities of the kingdome.

The Earle of Northumberland with a strong power was comming toward his sonne and his brother, (as men thought) or at the least towards the King; but the Earle of Westmerland, and Robert Waterton had gathered a great army, and had entred on their way to meete him sodainely, but he taking none of them boty to be his friends, returned vnto the castle of Warkworth.

When all things were set in a stay at Shrewsbury, the King went towards Yorke, where, when he was setled, he sent to the Earle of Northumberland, commaunding him to dismisse his company, and to come to him, and the Earle at the Kings commaundement came to him on the morrowe after Saint Laurence day, but the King receiued him not friendly, but as one that sued for pardon, and pardoning him of his life, committed him to safe custodie.

The Britons Armorikes, the Lord of Castels being their leader, inuaded the Towne of Plimmouth, spoyled and brent it, and went their way frō, but immediatly the westerne nauie, vnder the conduct of William Wilford esquire in the coast of Briton, toke fortie ships laden with yron, oyle, sope and wine of Rochell, to the number of a thousand tunne, and in returning backe againe, he brent fortie ships, and at Penarch the said William armed with his men, and burned townes and Lordships the space of 6. leagues, and set the towne of S. Matthew on fire, and their Mylles about the said towne.

1404. Frenchmen inuade the Ile of Wight.

A little before Christmasse, the Frenchmen came into the Ile of Wight, boasting that they would keepe their Christmasse there, and when a thousand of the Frenchmen were entred into the Iland, and driuing flockes of Cattell toward the Sea, sodainely there came vpon them a compaunie of the Ilande men, that forced them to leaue their pray behinde them, and to gette them gone (with shame ynough) to their shippes, with no small tolle of their men.

A Parliament at London, and a great taske.

In a parliament holden at London after the Octaues of the Epiphanie, the Erle of Northumberland was restored to his former estate and dignitie. And in this Parliament was granted vnto the King an vnaccustomed taske, very heauie and painefull for the inhabitants, the wardes of which taske the gran-ters thereof would haue to be kept secret for euermore: and vnder that condition only it was granted, that it should not be any example to them that should come after, and that there should remaine no record therof, but the same forthwith to be burnt.

The Frenchmen about that time came before the Ile of Wight with a great Nauy, and sent certaine of their men to demand in the name of king Richard, and of Quéene Isabell, a tribute or subsidie of the inhabitants: who answered, that king Richard was dead, and the Quéene, sometime his wife, was sent home to her parents, without condition of any tribute: but if the Frenchmens minde were to fight, they willed them to come vp, and no man should let them for the space of fiue houres to refresh themselues, but when that time was expired, they should haue battell giuen them, which when the Frenchmen heard, they went away and did nothing. Frenchmen come to the Ile of Wight.

The Lord of Cassels in Britaine, arriued at Blackepoole, two mile out of Dertmouth with a great Nauy, where of the rusticall people, whom he euer despised, he was slaine. There were taken that day three Lords, and twentie knights of name, and the vplandish people presenting their captiues vnto the king, returned with their purses full of golde. The Flemmings and Britaines tooke certaine shippes of ours laden with marchandises, and slew or hanged all the Mariners.

The olde Countesse of Oxford, mother to Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland (who as we said before died at Louaine) did cause such as were familiar with her, to bruite throughout all the parts of Essex, that king Richard was aliue, and that he should shortly come and chalenge his olde estate and dignitie. She caused many harts of siluer, and some of golde to be made for badges, such as king Richard was wont to bestowe on his knights, Esquires and friends, that distributing them in the kings name, she might the sooner allure the knights, and other valiant men of the Country, to be at her will and desire. The countesse of Oxford reported king Richard to be aliue.

Also, the fame and bruite which daily was blazed abroad by one William Serle, sometimes of king Richards chamber, that the same king Richard was in Scotland, and tarryed with a power of French and Scottishmen, caused many to beléeue that he was aliue. This William Serle had forged a priuie Seale in the said Richards name, and had sent diuers comfortable letters vnto such as were familiar with king Richard, by which meanes, many gaue the greater credit to the Countesse, insomuch, that some religious Abbots of that country did giue credit vnto her tales, who afterward were take at the kings commaundement, and imprisoned, because they did beléeue and giue credit to the Countesse in this behalfe, and the Countesse had all her goods confiscate, and was committed to close prison: and William Serle was drawen from pon- William Serle forging king Richards seale was drawen and executed.

About the feast of S. There came also with him William Clifford knight, who brought with him that William Serle King Richards chamberlaine before spoken of, whom by a wile he had apprehended, by which doing, the King pardoned him, for that he had kept the castle of Warwike against the Kings will and pleasure.

Ann. reg. 6.

The lay mans Parliament at Couentry.

About the feast of Saint Faith, the King called a parliament at Couentry, and sent processe to the Sheriffes that they should chose no knights nor burgesses that had any knowledge in the Lawes of the Realme, by reason whereof, it was called the Lay mens Parliament. These picked out Knights and Burgesses, could deuise none other way to releeue the Kings lacke of money, but to depriue the Cleargie of their temporall landes and goods, by this occasion giuen, arose great alteration and variance betweene the Cleargie and the laytie. The Knights affirming that they had oftentimes going forth with the King against rebels and enemies, not onely spent largely their goods, with and for the King, but also had set their bodies in great daunger and ieopardies, where in the meane season the Clearkes sate idle at home, and helped the King neuer a whit.

The Knights and Burgesses, require the temporall goods to be taken from the Cleargie.

But Thomas Arundell Archbishop of Canterbury made answere, that the cleargie did alwayes giue the King as much as the lay people did, considering that they did oftner giue the King tenths, then the laytie gaue fifteenes. And moreouer, that more of their tenants did serue the King in his warres, then of the tenants of the lay fee. And besides this, they prayed day and night for the prosperitie of the King, and of al them that faithfully serued him.

Thomas Arundell Archbishop of Canterburie his answere to the Burgesses.

And when the speaker of the parliament named Iohn Cheyney, said with a loude voyce & angry countenance, that he little regarded the prayers of the Church, the Archb. of Canterbury answered: Oh (quoth he) now I perceiue plainely to what end the fortune of this realme will come, when the Suffrages of the church are excluded and little set by, wherewith the godhead is wont to be appeased: surely that kingdome neuer continueth firme and stable, that is voyde of prayer and deuotion: notwithstanding, thou which settest at naught the religion of the Clergie, thinke not without punishment to take away the possessions of the church, for if the Archbishop of Canterbury liue, thou shalt haue euil taking of any thing that is his. Then the archbishop considering that the king did winke at these things, rose vp, and kneeled downe before the king, desiring him to consider how gratiously, & by Gods fauor, he had attained the kingdome, that he would consider his first promise, which was, that he would preserue vnto euery man their right & title so far as lay in him. He also willed him to remember ỹ oth which he voluntarily made, which was, that he would honor and defend the church, and would cherish and maintaine the ministers thereof: he required him to consider the danger and dishonur of breaking an oth, wherefore he desired him to permit and suffer the church to enioy the priuiledges uiledges and liberties, which in time of his predecessors it did enioy, and to leaue that king, by whom all kings do raigne. When the Archbishop had said these and like words, the king commaunded him to go againe to his seat, and said, that his intent and purpose was to leaue the Church in as good state or better then he found it. And then the Archbishop speaking to the knights and burgesses, said: You, and such like as you be, haue giuen such counsell vnto our king and to his predecessors, to confiscate the goods & lands of the Celles which the Frenchmen and Normans did possesse in England, and said, that by them he should heape vp great riches, as indeed they were worth many thousands of golde. Notwithstanding, it is most true that the king at this day is not the richer thereby of halfe a Marke; for you haue extorted, or at the least begged them out of his hands, and haue appropriated the said goods vnto your selues, so that it may be coniectured that your request to haue our temporalties, is not for the kings profit, but for your owne couetousnesse: for without doubt, if the king (as God forbid hee should) fulfill your wicked purpose, he should not be one farthing the richer the next yeere following: and surely, I will sooner let my head be cut off, then that the Church should be destitute of the least right that pertaineth to it.

Cosmo Cardinal of sta Croce by name of Innocent VII.

The knights of the Parliament hearing this saying of the Archbishop, and seeing the constancie of their Metropolitane, held their peace, but yet persisted in minde to haue their purpose: which the Archbishop perceiuing (hauing his eye on eche side to marke what was done) laboured so to disappoint their doings, that he wanne the fauour of certaine of the temporall Lords to assist him, who constantly auouched by their consents, that the Church should neuer be spoyled of the temporalties. And heere they acquite the Archbishoppe and Prelates, one pleasure for another, which they had done for them before. When the commons in this Parliament required that all such landes and reuenues as sometime belonged vnto the Crowne, and had beene giuen away, eyther by the king, or by his predecessors king Edward or Richard, should againe bee restored vnto the Crowne. Vnto which request the Archbishop and other the Prelates would in no case condescend: and so it came to passe, that there was no more mention made after wards of any exactions of the temporalties. But contrariwise, the knights of the Parliament, who had shewed themselues so importunate in that errour, confessed vnto the Archbishop their fault and malice, desiring him to forgiue them.

Moreouer they gaue him thanks, for that through his stoute courage the Church at that time recouered strength, reciting the saying of the Ethnike, Thou vnder an hard Prince, and an euill time, art bolde to do good. Besides many things that were granted to the king in this Parliament, the lay people granted him two fifteenes vpon condition, that the Lord Furniuall should receiue all the money, and see it to be spent in the kings warres.

Two fifteenes granted to the king.

Also the Letters patents that were giuen to sundry persons, for yearely reuenewes by king Edward, and king Richard, were called in againe, the knights of the Parliament so adiudging it, although it redounded to the kings dishonour. The Clergy granted the king a tenth and a halfe.

A tenth and a halfe granted to the king.

William Wikeham Bishop of Winchester, his College in Oxford.

This yere died William Wikeham bishop of Winchester, by whose charges and trauell, the Cleargie of England was much increased, for he builded a notable Colledge in Oxford, for the increase of learning, where he placed the warden & his company, to the number of lxx. besides children, seruants, & ten priests, to keepe daily seruice, endowing ỹ said company with sufficient lands.

His College at Winchester

He began the foundation of a newe College at Winchester, and in sixe yeres finished the same, where he placed the like number of Schollers to learne their Grammar, and other principles, to be sent afterward to his other Colledge at Oxford. These two Colledges are called, the Newe Colledges, dedicated to our blessed Lady.

Saint Swithens in Winchester the Church for the most part new builded by Wikeham.

He builded the great body of the Church of Saint Swithens in Winchester, where the sermons are made, and where his body is enterred, a very princely worke: neither did he for all this diminish any thing of his ordinary houshold charges, and fed (as the writing engraued on his Sepulchre sheweth) bothrich and poore. He deceased at the age of lxxx. yeres. He died rich, for beside that he gaue to his kinsfolke and to the poore, he gaue somewhat to euery Church in his dioces. He gaue many things to the king, and to his owne seruants, and to his Colledges: neither do I doubt but that he that thus liued, is now with God, whom I beseech to raise vp many like Bishops in England.

This William Wickham was borne at Wickham in Hampshire, of which place he toke his surname, and was of some called Long, because he was a tall man: one master Wodale of Wickham brought him vp at schole, where he learned his Grammar, & to write faire. After this, the Constable of Winchester Castle, at that time a great ruler in Hampshire, got Peter, alias Wickham of Wodal and made him his Clearke. Edward the third comming to Winchester Castle, liked Wickham, and toke him to seruice, and vnderstanding that he had mind to be a priest, made him first Parson of S. Martins in London and then Deane of Saint Martins le Grand, and then Archdeacon of Buckingham. He made him also surueyor of his buildings, as of Windsor, Quinborow in Kent, and other places. After this, he preferred him to be bearer of the priuy Seale, master of the Wards and Forrests, and Treasurer of the kings reuenues in Fraunce, Archdeacon of Lincolne, then Bishop of Winchester, Chancellor and Treasurer of England.

Banishment of Wikeham but a fable.

Of his banishment out of the Realme whereof some haue written, I find no mention thereof in Thomas Walsingham, Henry Knitton and other Authors at that time liuing, nor more of his troubles, but onely that by meanes of Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, his goods were by Edward the third confiscate, and giuen to Richard the sonne of the blacke Prince, in Anno. 1376. and by the meanes of Alice Pierce were againe restored to the said Bishop in the yere next following, to wit, in Anno 1377. as more at large in those yeres

I haue set downe: moreouer it is manifest, that if he had sustained the losse of all his goods, and seuen yeeres banishment (as some haue fabuled) it would haue beene hard for him, or rather impossible to haue brought so many great workes to perfection, as the world can witnesse to haue beene done at his charges. To him in that Bishoprick succeeded Henry Bewfort, sonne to Iohn of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, by his wife Katherin Swinford, he was translated from Lincolne to Winchester, and Philip Reppon Abbot of Leicester, was at the kings request made Bishop of Lincolne. The king kept his Christmas at Eltham in Kent. 1405.

About the feast of Saint Valentine, the sonnes of the Earle of March were taken out of the Castell of Windsore, and led away into Wales to Owen Glendouerdew, but shortly after were recouered againe. The Lady Spencer sister to the Duke of Yorke, and widow of Thomas Lord Spencer, before executed at Bristow being apprehended and committed to prison, accused her brother the Duke of Yorke to be chiefe Author in stealing away of the Earle of Marches sonnes, wherefore the said Duke was kept by sir Iohn Pelham in the Castell of Pemsey till the next Parliament.

After the feast of the Purification of our Lady, the king assembled his Barons at London, to treat of the gouernment of the Realme, and to haue ayde of money to be giuen him, but the Nobles would not at that time obey his request. In the Lent following therefore, the king caused the Cleargy and the Barons to assemble at S. Albones for the matter aforesaid, but by reason the nobles stroue against him, there was nothing done, and so departed on Palme Sunday.

About the xv. of March, in a fight betwixt the Englishmen and Welchmen, the sonne of Owen Glendouerdew was taken, and 1500. with him were taken or slaine.

Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, Richard Scroope Archbishoppe of Yorke, Thomas Mowbray Earle Marshall, Thomas Lord Bardolph and other, conspiring against K. Henry, assembled together the Citizens of Yorke, and many other, to stand with them for the commoditie of the Realme. And to animate the commons to be the readier vnto this businesse, they set Articles vpon the doores of the Monasteries and Churches of the same Citie, written in English against the king, because he had put downe King Richard, offering themselues for those Articles to liue and dye, which caused great number of people to resort to them: but Ralph Neuell Earle of Westmerland that was not farre off, together with Iohn Duke of Lancaster, the kinges sonne, being enformed of these things, gathered an army with speede to goe against the Archbishoppes company, but all was in vaine, for the Archbishoppes power was farre greater than theirs, whereupon the Earle of Westmerland sent messengers, to enquire of the Archbishoppe the cause of so great an assembly in armour, contrary to the kings peace: whereunto the Archbishop answered, that he toke nothing in hand against the kings peace, and he was in Conspiracy against king Henry by the Archbishop of Yorke & other.

armour, and munited with men, onely for feare of the king whom he could not safely come vnto to speake; but his purpose (he said) was good and commodious both for the King and the Realme, if happily they would know it: and then he shewed a Scedule, in which the Articles were contayned, which when the Earle of Westmerland had read, hée with word and countenance praised the Bishops holy and vertuous intent, and promised, that hée and his would prosecute the same with the Archbishop.

The Archbishop being glad of this, beléeued the Earles wordes, and perswaded the Earle Marshall, being vnwilling thereunto, to go with him to a place appointed to talke together, to whom they with like number came, and the writing with the Articles was read ouer: straightway the Earle and they that were with him gaue their assent to these articles: then said the Earle being subtiller than the rest, behold the labour that we haue taken in hand to come to such ende as we would haue it, and the people hath now béene long in armour, let some of your men beare word vnto the people to go their way home, and to lay downe their armour, and euery man to fall to his occupation and accustomed labour: in the meane season, we, in token of concord will drink together, that the people on both sides shall sée it, and without delay, after they had taken each other by the hands, a knight was sent on the Archbishops behalfe, to beare word to the people that it was peace, and to commaund euery man to lay downe their armour, and to go to their owne home.

The people beholding signes of peace, and the Lords drinking together, being wearied with the vnaccustomed trauell of warre, turned the reines of their bridles homewards, and so it came to passe, that when the people of the Archbishops side went away, the number of the aduersaries increased, as before it was appointed, and the Archbishop did not perceiue that he was betrayed, vntill such time as the Earle arrested him: hée arrested the Marshall also, and many other with him, to all which it was promised that they should haue no harme, but that promise was not kept, for both the Archbishop and the Earle Marshall were brought to Pontfract to the king, who in the meane while was aduanced thither with his power, and from thence he went to Yorke, whither the prisoners were also brought: others say that the king sojourning at Bishops Thorpe, the Archbishop was brought thither, where sir William Fulford knight learned in the lawes, sitting on an high stage in the Hall, gaue iudgement that the Archbishop should be beheaded: he was therefore set on an ill fauoured iade, with his face towarde the horse taile, and carried with great scorne and shame enough to a fielde there beside, where with fiue strokes his head was smitten off on the morrow after Whitsonday: with him were condemned and executed the Earle Marshall, sir Iohn Lamplough, and sir Robert Plompton. After the king had ransomed and otherwise punished by grieuous fines the Citizens of Yorke, he departed from Yorke with an army of 37000. fighting men furnished with all prouision, marching northward against the Earle of Northumberland. At his comming to Durham the L. Hastings, the L. Falconbridge, sir Iohn Colule of the Dale, and sir Iohn Griffith, being conuicted of the conspiracie, were were beheaded. The Earle of Northumberland perceiuing the kings intent, got himselfe to Berwike with 300. horse, and from thence into Scotland. The K. being bent against the Earle of Northumberland, went to Berwike, from whence the Earle fled into Scotland, and the Lord Bardolph with him, whom Dauid Lord Fleming the Scot receiued into alliance. The king vnderstanding that the Earle was fled, he commaunded them in the Castell to render it vnto him, which when they refused to do, the king caused a great Gun to be shot, which ouerthrew part of a Tower, wherupon they of the Castel gaue ouer, and submitted themselues to the king, who caused some of them to be beheaded, and the residue to be sent to prisons. After this, the Castell of Alnewike, and the rest of the Earles Castles were with small adoe rendred to his hands: with which successe the king being incouraged, went straight into Wales, where contrariwise nothing prospered with him, wherefore he returned, losing charets, carts, and wagons, to the number of fiftie, with his treasure, so that comming backe to Worcester, he sent for the Archbishop and Bishops, and declared to them his misfortune, desiring them to helpe him: to whom the Archbishop answered, that he would talke with the Cleargie in that matter. In the meane season the Frenchmen came to succor the Welchmen with 140. ships: they landed in Milford hauen, hauing lost almost all their horses for lacke of fresh water. The Lord Barkley and Henry Pay burned fiftéen of those ships in the same Hauen. These Frenchmen besieged the town of Carmarden, and toke it, granting to the inhabitants all their moueable goods, and to go whither they would.

The Bishop escaped and fled, but the Earle of Orkeney, and the said Iames the young lad, was sent to the Tower of London, where he remained prisoner till the second yéere of Henry the first, which was aboue eightéene yéeres.

This summer, through corruption of the ayre, so great a plague was shed vpon mens bodies, as was not séene the like in many yéeres in this lande, so that men might say:

Pestilence.

The south winds warme did blow, with heat pestiferous,
And pestilence did beare great rule in Cities populous.

For at London in short while it consumed aboue 30000. men and women. and in the countrey townes great mortalitie fell among the husbandmen, so that great households died cleane vp, and the houses were emptied.

In time of this pestilence the King durst not come néere to the Citie of London, wherefore being at the Castell of Léedes in Kent, he departing from, thence thence, toke shipping at Quinborow in the Ile of Sheppey, to sayle ouer into Esser, and so to go to Plashey, there to passe the time till the mortality were ceased. But as the king was on the sea, certaine French Pirates which lay lurking at the Thames mouth to watch for some pray, got knowledge of the kings passage, and thereupon as he was in the middest of his course, they entred amongst his fleete and toke foure vessels next to the kings shippe, and in one of the same vessels sir Thomas Rampton, the Kings vicechamberlaine, with all his chamber stuffe and apparrell. They followed the king so nere, that if his ship had not beene swift, he had landed sooner in Fraunce, than in Esser: But such was his good hap that he escaped, and arrived at his appointed port.

About the fifteenth day of August deceased, sir Robert Knowles knight, at his Manour of Sconethorpe in Norffolke, he was brought to London, and there honourably buried by the Lady Constance his wife, in the white Friers Church which he had newly reedified and builded.

Sir Robert Knowles. Iohn Leiland.

This sir Robert Knowles had beene a most valiant Captaine in the warres of France, during the raigne of Edward the third, and Richard the second, whose force the Realme of France both felt and feared, so did the Dukedome of Brytaine, and all the people from hence to Spayne. Of him in his life were made verses in Latin, which may be englished thus.

Register of Bermondsey.

O Robert Knowles, most worthy of fame,
By thy prowesse France was made tame:
Thy manhood made the Frenchmen to yeeld,
By dint of sword in towne and field.

Verses.

This sir Robert Knowles founded in the towne of Pontfract a Colledge to the honour of the holy Trinitie, with an Hospitall ioyned thereunto. In the which Colledge was placed a Maister, and fiue or seuen Priestes, and in the Hospitall 13. poore men and women. He was once minded to haue made this Colledge at his manour of Sconethorpe, but at the request of Constance his wife (a woman of meane birth, and sometime of a dissolute life afore her mariage) he turned his purpose, and made it in the very place of Pontfrait, where she was borne, endowing the same with 180. pound land by yere. Hee also builded the faire new great bridge at Rochester, ouer the riuer of Medeway, with a Chappell and a Chauntrie at the east ende therof. In the which Chappell was sometime a table hanging, wherein was noted the benefactors to that bridge, as followeth.

All these had giuen money or lands towards the building and repayring of the said bridge.

Notwithstanding this table, I finde in record as followeth: The bridge betwixt the Citie of Rochester, and the village of Strode was in the fourth yéere of king Richard the second, sore decayed or broken downe by tempest of weather, and inundation of the riuer of Medway, whereupon William Basing Master of the hospitall at Strode, and Nicholas Hering, were licensed by the king to repaire the same. And in the eleuenth yéere of the same king Richard the second, Iohn Cobham, and Robert Knowles beganne their charge towards the building of the said bridge, and in the eightéene yéere of the same Richard, the said Iohn Cobham founded a Chantry in the Chappel there of three Chapleins, and gaue lands to the bridge in the 22. yéere of Richard the second: and thus much of the record haue I noted.

Ann. reg. 9. I finde further by Iohn Leiland, that one Iohn Warner a Merchant of Rochester made the new coping of Rochester bridge. And William Warham Archbishop of Canterbury made the yron pikes and barres aboue the same coping.

This Robert Knowles, was also one of the founders of an hospitall in the Citie of Rome, in manner following: for that there was no Nation of the world, but had some kinde of hospitalitie in Rome, saue onely the people of England, certaine Englishmen beeing in Rome, procured licence of the Pope to build an hospitall, in place where Thomas Becket Archbishoppe of Canterbury had sometime builded a Chappell of the holy Trinitie. In this hospitall which they builded, was to be releeued, a gentleman three daies, bread, wine, and ware: a commoner eight daies and nightes, meate, drinke, and lodging. The founders of this hoſpitall were, ſir Robert Braybroke Biſhop of London, Thomas Brampton Biſhoppe of Rocheſter, ſir Iohn Philpot and his wife, ſir Robert Knowles, ſir Hugh Calueley, ſir Iohn Haukewood, ſir Iohn Thornam, Knightes, Iohn Twiforde, Iohn Shepard and Alice his wife, Robert Criſtall and Agnes his wife, Robert Windleront, Walter Whithers, Robert at Pyne, Adam Staple, Henry Line Draper, and other Citizens of London in the yéere of our Lord 1380. in the Raigne of King Richard the ſecond: which Hoſpitall was againe newe reedified and made a goodly houſe in the yéere of our Lord 1449. towardes the charges whereof, was money gathered in euerie Pariſh in Englande, but that came to ſmall effect, the charges of collecting and conueying was ſuch, that, there came towardes the woorke not paſt one thouſande Duckettes in one whole yéere.

In November a Parliament being called at London, a taxe of money was leuied of the whole Realme. Parliament at London.

This yéere was a ſore and ſharpe winter, and ſuch aboundance of ſnow, which continued December, Ianuarie, Februarie and March, ſo that almoſt all ſmall birds dyed through hunger and cold. Whiles the King held a great Councell at London with the Nobles of the Realme, Henry Earle of Northumberland, and Thomas Lord Bardolfe came againe into England, who after long iourneying, when they came to the Towne of Thriſke, they cauſed to bée proclaymed, that who ſo would haue libertie, ſhould take vp armour and weapon and follow them, whereupon much people reſorted to them: but ſir Thomas Rockley Sherife of Yorkeſhire, with other Knights of that countrey went againſt them, and at Bramham Moore nére to Haſewold, fought with them a great battell, and ſlue the Earle, whoſe head was ſtraight-waies cut off. The Lord Bardolfe was ſore wounded and taken aliue, but died ſhortly after. This battell was fought on the xviii day of Februarie. The Earles head was put on a ſtake, and carried openly through the Citie of London, and ſet on London bridge. The Biſhoppe of Bangor was taken with the Lords, but pardoned of his life, becauſe he was not found in armour. The King went to Yorke, and there condemned ſuch as tranſgreſſed, confiſcated their goods, pacified the countrey, hanged the Abbot of Hayle, who had béene in armour, and returned to the ſouth partes againe. 1408. Ann. reg. 10.

Vpon the ſeuenth of September there were ſuch ſtouds of rayne, as the olde men of that age had neuer ſéene before. Edmond Holland Earle of Kent whileſt hée beſieged the Caſtell of Briake in Britaine, he was wounded with an arrow of a Croſſebow in the head, notwithſtanding he toke the Caſtell and deſtroyed it to the ground, and not long after his braines rotted, and he died. Edmond Holland Earle of Kent wounded to death.

The Counteſſe of Kent that was daughter to Barnabe Viſcount Lord of William hauing no issue by her husband, was now moued by the king, after her husbands death to marry with his bastard brother, the Earle of Dorset, but she chose for her husband, Henry Mortimer, a goodly young Bachelor, by whom she had issue Anne married to sir Iohn Aubemond.

About the feast of All-Saints the Cardinals of Burges came into England, being sent from the Colledge of Cardinals, to enforme the King and Cleargie of the vnconstant dealing of Pope Gregory, as also he had informed the French King and his Cleargy and Realme, to the ende that those two kings might set to their helping handes, to induce the saide Gregory to obserue the oath he had made, and that by the magnificence of those two kings, concord might be made in the Church, vnto the which businesse the French king had gladly granted, and sent messengers vnto Pope Gregory, who notwithstanding was obstinate.

The King of England when he vnderstoode the Cardinalles message, hée commaunded that courteste and gentle entertainement should be giuen him, and offered to beare his charges so long as he would abide in England.

Sigismond Bro. to Wencoslous Emp. of Germany. After the feast of the Epiphany, the Archbishop of Canterbury caused to assemble at London, all the Cleargy of the Realme, to chose personages méte to go to the generall councell holden at Pisa, whereunto were chosen Robert Holam Bishop of Salisbury, Henry Chiseley Bishop of Saint Dauids, and Thomas Chillingdon Prior of Christes Church in Canterbury, and the king had sent before Iohn Coluile knight, and master Nicholas Rixton Clearkes, with letters to be giuen to them. And in the letter to the Pope it was written.

King Henry writeth to the Pope. Most holy Father, our humble recommendations in filiall wise premised. The inscrutable wisedome of the high God doth sometime dissemble in some sort, the sinnes of men, if at length they will yet amend, though not through seruile feare, but by their filiall conscience moouing or pricking them. And how much the longer hée deferreth his yre in this life, so much the more grieuously will hée punish in the life to come, as is to be feared. Wée therefore in our mindes reuoluing the long, and as it were the inueterate Schisme now in the Church of God being very hotte, truely we feare, as by likelyhode is to be feared, that it ought to bée imputed to all Princes of the Christian Religion before God and man, vnto a slouthfull negligence, the cruelty of such an errour, nourished thus long: Therefore specially because the Cleargie of euerie kingdome, eyther feare, or the blindenesse of auarice causing them, doe couer this wicked Schisme vnder the veyle of deuotion, and holinesse, so that those Princes, to whom the materiall swoorde is committed, for the defence and safegarde of the Church, about this foresaid Schisme, to be vtterly extirped, they neyther goe about to shewe any great instance of courteous perswasion, nor to put in practise the sword for the purpose. Whereupon, hauing heard often-times of many, and vnderstand now a good while agone by letters of the most reuerend in Christ, our fathers the L. Cardinalles of your Colledge, and by the report of the reuerend in Christ, the Lord Cardinall of Burdeaux our friend, worthily beloued on the behalfe of the Colledge, comming to the presence of vs, and of our first begotten sonne the Prince of Wales, and of the prelates and priors of our Realme, how that not onely hee, but also the Cardinalles of your said Colledge, by occasion of the continuance of this schisme, contrary vnto the vowe and othe made by your holinesse, to renounce the papacie, haue withdrawne from you all their obedience, and doe determine to holde a generall councell in the feast of the Annunciation of our Lady nowe nexte to come at the Citie Pisa, a place indeede fit, as it is said, and honest, and by your holinesse commended for meete and conuenient, as it is affirmed, that this may bee done, especially by force of a certaine obligation for occasion of the schisme to bee extirped by your holinesse, whilest you were yet in minoritie, of your owne accord, and solemnly entred or made in the conclaue with the Cardinalles aforesaid, and after that you were reuoked to the papall dignitie, by the subscription of your holy hands, openly renowed and confirmed, as by the viewe of a certaine publike instrument before vs and the states abouesaid exhibited it plainely, as hath to vs appeared, not knowing how the vnion of the Church may be come vnto by any other way more commodiously. Whereupon the sayde Cardinall hath requested vs, vpon consideration of the premisses, and other reasonable causes by him openly expressed, and in the same letters euidently comprehended, which indeede greatly moued both the consciences of vs, and of the said states, that we should take care to imploy our counsell and ayde about the premisses, to the said Colledge, for the respect of the godlie zeale and loue which thereto we beare, together with other catholike Princes, and that wee should send our Ambassadors and prelates of our Realme by themselues, or by procurators to the said councell. We therefore, desirous to shew the zeale and intent which we beare and haue to the same vnion, and noting with more heede the wholesome and holy intention of the same Colledge in the premesses, as other Princes doe note the same, as we here at this present, willing also, so farre as in vs lieth to the honour of God, and that we may auoyde the sworde edge of his wrath, to doe our partes about the reformation of the same state of the Church, hauing taken with our said sonne, and also with the Prelates and Nobles aforesaid, ripe deliberation, wee beseech with all humilitie, and in the bowelles of Iesus Christ, exhorting, doe require your clemencie, whose state and honour vpon diuers causes as a deuout sonne of the Church, so farre as with God wee might, we haue euer embraced, and doe embrace by the expresse and whole assent of the states aforesaid, that as well for the auoyding of the manifest slaunder of the Church, as of the Apostolike sea, and for the desirefull conseruation of your estate and honour, and also for the desire of the faithfull procurators that will come to the said place and day together, and with all quietnesse, for the respect of him spetially that giueth grace to the humble, that we will vouchsafe to be present at the day and place before mentioned, in the spirite of humblenesse, to fulfill the vowe together, and such manner oth effectually, as we trust you will. For we hold for certaine, that, as we are informed, the Cardinals of both Colledges haue come together in one and the same consonancie of minde about the premisses, and as it were all the Princes Christians set forth themselues with glad mindes in their fauour and ayde, howsoeuer they seeke from elsewhere starting holes, the same Cardinals by Gods helpe assisting them, shall obtaine the effect of such an vnion: neyther doth it seeme to vs, or to the inhabitants of our Realme expedient, that we should disagree from other Catholike princes in so holy a purpose in any thing, but rather that we should cause our Ambassadors and Prelates of our Realme by themselues or their procurators, as we beleeue that other will do the like, that the vniuersall Church may be nourished with the pleasant taste of a wishfull vnion. Moreouer, most blessed father, if the prouidence of the Apostolike sea would vouchsafe to attend and marke, what great harmes danger is sprung vp throughout the whole world, not onely of bodies, but also of soules, redeemed by Christes bloud, haue hitherto chanced vnder pretence of the continuation of the said Schisme, and specially the slaughter of Christian people, which aboue the number, as men say, of two hundred thousand are perished by the raging of diuers warres that haue risen in sundrie partes of the world, and euen now of late, to the number of thirtie thousand, which (by reason of the dissention had vpon the Bishoprieke of Leige betwixt two which doe striue and contende, the one in the authoritie of the true Pope, and the other by the authoritie of the antipope) were in slaughter fielde (a lamentable thing to be spoken) slayne and destroyed. Truely, the Apostolike sea would be in great heauinesse of heart, and would rather forsake the honour of the Apostolicall sea, than then to see from henceforth such wicked slaughter to be committed, and would take example of the true mother, who before King Salomon, rather chose to giue place, than that the childe should be cut in peeces. And albeit by the creation of the nine Cardinals, against your oath (that we may vse other mens words) lately by you made, of the which Act a vehement cause of admiration is raysed, it may in some wise be presumed, that as is like to be thought, your intention doth not bende to the ende of extirping the Schisme, yet God forbid that your holinesse should circumspectly be noted of such vnconstancie of minde by any manner of person, whereupon the last errour may be accounted worse than the first, not onely to be execrated of euery Christian soule, but also to be expulsed with all indeuour. These things which we write, of a pure heart and vnfained faith doe proceede: and therefore (benigne father) if it please you, let these things with due consideration be weyed (most blessed father) let him incline your heart, and corroborate the same in this holy worke, happily to be executed, who for peace sake, when he was the King of all, endured the forme of a seruant. Written vnder our Signet, in our palace at Westminster, the 12. day of Nouember.

Thus haue I set downe the Epistle which the king sent to the Pope, that it may may appeare vnto all men how modestly he attempted to induce the Pope to performe his vow and oth, to the end the fault should not appeare to be in him, that the vnity of the Church was not reformed.

According to appointment the Cardinals of both Colledges, to wit, of Gregory, and of Bennet met at Pisa, effectually to intreat of the reformation of agreement, where almost all the Prelates of the whole Latin world, met together, and honourable men were elected to helpe the Cardinals in this case, who calling for the grace of the holy spirit, agréed in one, and chose one to be head of the Church, refusing the other two, and called his name Alexander the fift, and reiected both Gregory and Benedict.

This yeare was a great play at the Skinners well, néere vnto Clerken-well beside London, which lasted eight daies, & was of matter from the creation of the world: there were to sée the same, the most part of the nobles and gentles in England: and forthwith after began a royall iusting in Smithfield, betweene the Earle of Somerset and the Seneshall of Henalt, sir Iohn Cornwal, sir Richard of Arundel, and the son of sir Iohn Cheyney against other Frenchmen.

In a Parliament holden at London, in the Lent season, the knights and burgesses presented to the king a bil in this forme: To the most excellent Lord the king, and all the Nobles in this present Parliament assembled, your faithfull commons humbly do shew, that our Soueraigne Lord the king may haue the temporall possessions and lands, which by the Bishops, Abbots, and Priors are prowdly spent and wasted in this Realme, which would suffice to find 150. Earles, 1500. Knights, 6200. Esquires, and 100. hospitals more than now bée, &c. But when they went about to declare out of what places those great summes were to be leuied, wherby the foresaid states should be endowed, they wanted in their account: wherefore the king commaunded them, that from thencefoorth they should not presume to moue any such matter.

Sir Robert Vmfreuile vicеadmirall of England annoyed the countries on the sea coastes of Scotland: for comming into the Frith with tenne ships of warre, and lying there fourtéene daies together, landing euery day on the one side of the riuer, or on the other, taking praies, spoyles, and prisoners, notwithstanding the Duke of Albany, and the Earle Dowglas were ready there with a great power to resist him: he brent the Galiot of Scotland (being a ship of great account) with many other vessels lying the same time at the Blacknes, ouer against Lithe. The Realme of Fraunce being disquieted with the two factions of the Duke of Burgoyne, and the Duke of Orliance, sonne to the Duke of Orliance lately slaine (at Paris) by the procurement of the Duke of Burgondy, the kings of Nauarre, and Aragon, the Dukes of Bituria, and Britaine, the Gascoyners, and Acquitaines, the Earles of Hays and Arminake, and many other ayding ỹ Duke of Orliance therin. The Duke of Burgoyne, whom the French king, and his eldest sonne, called the gouernour of France, fauoured, seeing that the contrary part was very strong, sent ambassadours into England, desiring the kings aide against the Duke of Orliance, and promised many things, amongst the which, he promised his daughter in marriage to the Prince, and a great summe of gold with her. To whom the king answered: we aduertise you not to fight with your enemie in this case, who iustly seemeth to bere you, for the death of his father by you procured: but as much as in you lieth, endeuour your selfe to mitigate the young mans wrath, and promise to make him reasonable satisfaction according to the aduise of your friends. And if then he will not cease from persecuting you, get you into the strongest place of your dominion, and there gather such power as may be able to put off his force. If then after this, he will make warre against you, you shall haue the fairer occasion to fight with him, and in such case, we will shew you such fauour, as ye haue demaunded. Thus there were sent ouer to his aide Thomas Earle of Arundell, Gilbert Vmframuile Earle of Angus, or Earle of Kyme, sir Robert Vmframuile vncle to the said Gilbert, sir John Oldcastle, Lord of Cobham, sir Iohn Grey, and William Porter with twelue hundred archers, they toke shipping at Doner, and landed at Cluce, from whence they went to Arras, where they found the Duke of Burgoyne, of whom they were ioyfully receiued, and from thence he appointed them to Parowne, where he assembled a power of his owne subiectes, marched feward Arras, and so to Marquion, where he lodges his Flemings. The Duke of Orliance had thirty thousand fighting men, drawing towards him, and laide siege about one part thereof, there were many skirmishes, but finally they within the Towne abandoned it, and the Flemings destroyed it. From thence the Duke went to Neolle, and it was destroied euen as it were in passing by it, from thence they went before Roy in Vermondois, which yelded to them, from thence to Montliden, &c. The Duke of Burgoyne went to Arras, from thence to Roy, from thence to Bzetoue, and after to Beauuais, the Earle of Arundell was with him in his ayde with fiue hundred Englishmen, from thence he went to Poitoise, from thence to Meulent, and so to Paris. The Duke of Orliance was lodged at Saint Diones, and at Saint Clow, with a great power. About the tenth of Nouember, Iohn Duke of Burgoyne issued out of Paris, and went to Saint Clow, where putting his people in order, the Earle of Arundel and his people made a great assault, so that they within were driuen to yeld to the will of the English men, wherefore they were bountifully rewarded by the Duke of Burgoyne, and then returned into England.

Hist. Lewis Dorli.

King Henry created his brother Thomas Bewfort, Earle of Dorset, and his sonne Thomas of Lancaster that was steward of England and Earle of Aumarle, he created Duke of Clarence. An. reg. 13.

A squire of Wales named Rice ap Dee, which had long time rebelled against the King, was brought to London, and there drawen, hanged and quartered.

After the feast of All-saints, a Parliament was begun at London. The king caused a new kind of Nobles to be made, which were of lesse valew then the olde by fower pence in the Noble, so that fiftie Nobles should waie a pound Troy weight.

Edward Duke of Yorke this yere began the foundation of the Colledge of Fodringhey in Northamptonshire, for a master, twelue priests, eight Clearkes, and thirteene Choristers, Henry the fift gaue landes thereunto, of Pryors alians by him suppressed, and mought dispend yerely (as was valued at the suppression) fower hundreth and ninténe poundes, eleuen shillings. 1412. Colledge at Fodringhey.

Iohn Duke of Burgoyne, hauing now the gouernment, both of the French King and of his Realme, he so persecuted the Duke of Orliance and his complices, that at the last, the saide Duke Charles, was forced to sende into Englande certaine persons, as his procuratours, to offer in his name vnto King Henry, and to his sonnes, certaine conditions, which were concluded the eight day of May. The said Charles Duke of Orliance besought the King of England to send vnto him 8000. men to aide him against the Duke of Burgoyne and his complices, which daily procured the French King to make war vpon them.

King Henry curteously entertained the messengers, and vpon consideration had of their offers, which seemed to make greatly both for his honour and profite, as Duke of Guyen, he toke vpon him to succour and defend them against all men, as their Lord and soueraigne, and so sending away the messengers, promised to send them aide very shortly.

King Henry minded a voyage into Fráce.

Then said the King to the Archbishop of Canterburie, Lord Chancellor, do you not see howe the Almightie hath disposed for vs, beholde now the acceptable time, let vs goe into Fraunce, to winne with small adoe, that which is our right? And surely it was thought he would haue recouered Fraunce, at that time, if strength of body had beene answerable to his minde, but being oppressed with great sickness he could not endure, neither to go nor ride, yet he commaunded all those to come to him that held of him by knightes seruice, as if he had meant to go ouer the sea, but the Lords of the Realme perswaded him to commit that iourney vnto his second sonne Thomas.

T. Otarborne.

In the meane time Henry the Prince, sonne to the king, offended with certaine of his fathers family, which were said to sowe discord betwixt the father and the sonne, he wrote vnto all the parts of the Realme, endeuouring himselfe to refell all the practises and imaginations of such detractors, and slaunderous people, and to make the matter more manifest to the world, he came to the king his father about the feast of Peter and Paule, with such a number of his friends and wellwillers, as a greater had not beene seene in those dates. He was straight waies admitted to his fathers presence, of whom this one thing he besought him of, that if such as had accused him might be conuicted of vniust accusation, that they might be punished, not according to their deserts, but yet after their lies were proued against them, they might somewhat taste of that which they had meant, although not to the vttermost: to the which request the King seemed to graunt, but he tolde him, that he must tarry a Parliament, that such might be tried and punished by iudgement of their peeres. Thus farre Thomas Otarborne. To the same effect (but in more ample manner) writeth the translator of Titus Liuius (who wrote an history of Henry the fift, and dedicated it to Henry the first,) as he was informed by the Earle of Ormond, an eye witnesse of the same, as followeth: During the sickness of the King (saith he) some euill disposed people laboured to make dissention betweene the King, and the prince his sonne, by reason whereof, and by the Actes of youth which he exercised more then meanely, and for the great recourse of people vnto him, of whom his Court was at all times more aboundant than his fathers, the King suspected that he would presume to vsurpe the Crowne, he being aliue, which suspicious iealousie was occasion, that he in part withdrew his affection, and singular loue from the Prince: but when the Noble Prince was aduertised of his fathers iealousie, and mistrust, by some his secret friendes of the Kinges

Thus strangely apparelled, with a great company of Lords, and other Noble men of his court, he came to the King his father, who at that time lay at Westminster, where at his comming (by commaundement of him) not one of his company aduanced himselfe further then the fire in the hall, notwithstanding that they were greatly and ofte desired to the contrarie, by the Lords and great estates of the Kings Court: and this they did not onely because the weather was colde, but because the Prince had so commaunded them, to giue the lesse occasion of mistrust to the King his father, but hee himselfe onely accompanied of the Kings household passed forth to the King his father, to whom (after due salutation) he desired to shew the intent of his minde in secret manner. Then the King caused himselfe to be borne in his chaire into his secret chamber (because he was diseased and might not goe) where in the presence of three or foure persons, in whom the King had most confidence, he commaunded the Prince to shewe the effect of his minde: Then the Prince kneeling downe before his father, said to him these words, Most redoubted Lord and father, I am this time come to your presence, as your liegeman, and as your sonne naturall, in all things to obey your grace as my soueraigne Lord and father. And whereas I vnderstand yée haue mée suspect of my behauiour against your grace, and that ye feare I would vsurpe your crowne against the pleasure of your highnesse, of my conuersation your grace knoweth that if ye were in feare of any man, of what estate soeuer he were, my dutie were to the endangering of my life to punish that person, thereby to race that sore from your heart: and then how much rather ought I to suffer death to bring your grace from the feare that ye haue of me that am your naturall sonne, and your liegeman. And to that intent I haue this day by confession of my sinnes and receiuing the Sacrament, prepared my selfe, and therefore most redoubted Lord and father, I beséech you in the honour of God, for the easing of your heart, heretofore your knées to slea me with this dagger, and at that worde with all reuerence hee deliuered to the King his dagger, saying, my Lord and father, my life is not so deerous to me, that I would liue one day that should bee to your displeasure, nor I couet not so much my life as I doe your pleasure and welfare, and in your thus doing, here in the presence of these Lords, and tofore God at the day of iudgement I clerely forgiue you my death. At these words of the Prince, the King taken with compassion of heart, cast from him the dagger, and imbracing the Prince kissed him, & with effusion of teares said vnto him, My right déere and hartily beloued sonne, it is of truth that I had you partly suspect, and as I now perceiue, vndeserued on your partie: but séeing this your humilitie and faithfulnesse, I shall neither slay you, nor from henceforth haue you any more in mistrust, for no report that shall be made vnto me, and thereof I assure you vpon mine honour. Thus by his great wisedome was the wrongfull imagi-

John Pendergest with thirtie shippes keeping the sea, toke wines and other victuales from y French, which though it pleased y Noble men little, yet it did great ease to the common people, who had all such things farre the better cheape. About the 19. of August King Henry by determination of the counsell, sent his second sonne Thomas Duke of Clarence, Edward Duke of Yorke, and Thomas Earle of Dorset, and manie valiant men, with a strong power to helpe the Duke of Orliance, against the Duke of Burgoyne, or euer all the other were returned, which a while agoe went ouer with the Earle of Arundell to ayde the Duke of Burgoyne, so that many men marueiled at the sudden change, that in so small a time the Englishmen did aide the two contrary parts: notwithstanding the Nobles went forward and arriued in Normandie, where when the Duke of Orliance did not meete them at the time appointed, they burnt his townes, and spoiled the countrie, taking many holdes: at length, though late, the Dukes of Clarence, and Orliance met and talked together, and the matter was so entreated of betweene them, that our men should desist from ranging through the countrie, and refraine from robberie, which when our men had graunted, they departed into Acquitaine, to winter there, and the Duke of Orliance went home to his countrie.

Tho. Walsing. King Henry gaue aide to the Duke of Orliance, against the duke of Burgoine.

An. reg. 14. About this time the Lord Helle Marshall of Fraunce with manie other Noble men, and men of armes, to the number of 4000. besieged a certaine holde in Aquitaine, which was in the keeping of Iohn Blunt Knight, who with 300. that aided him, put to flight the whole armie of the Frenchmen, and toke of them 12. men of name, and other gentlemen to the number of 120. and amongst other the said Monsier de Helle Marshall of Fraunce was one, who was sent ouer into England, and put in the Castle of Wisbich in Cambridge shire, but escaping thence, he got ouer into Fraunce, where he serued the Duke of Orliance, at the battaile of Agencourt, and was there slaine.

1413. King Henry kept his Christmasse at his manor of Eltham, being so sore sicke, that sometime men thought that he had bēen dead: notwithstanding it pleased God that he recouered strength a little, and as toyfully as he could, he celebrated that feast of Christmasse.

A Parliament at London. After Christmasse hee called the Nobles of England to a parliament at London, which began the morrow after Candlemasse day, but he lined not to the ende thereof, for he died shortly after in a chamber belonging to the abbot of Westminster, called Ierusalem, whereby the prophesie was fulfilled, as he said, that he should die there. In the time of whole languishing the King gaue to the Prince his sonne diuers notable doctrines and insignements, that not onely of him, but of euery Prince are to be holden and followed: among the which erudītions one is this: The King lieng greeuously diseased, called before him the Prince his sonne, and said vnto him: My sonne, I feare me sore, after my departure from this life, some discord shall grow godward arise betweene thée, and thy brother Thomas Duke of Clarence, whereby the Realme may be brought to destruction and miserie, for I know you both to be of great stomacke and courage. Wherefore I feare, that hée through his high minde will make some enterprise against thée, intending to usurpe vpon thee, which I know thy stomacke may not abide easily. And for dread hereof as oft as it is in my remembrance, I sore repent mée, that euer I charged my selfe with the crowne of this Realme. To these words of the king, the prince answered thus: Right redoubted lord and father, to the pleasure of God your grace shall long continue with vs, and rule vs both: but if God haue so prouided that euer I shall succéd you in this Realme, I shall honor and loue my brethren aboue all men, as long as they be to me true, faithfull and obedient, as to their soueraigne Lord: but if any of them fortune to conspire or rebell against me, I assure you, I shall assone execute iustice vpon one of them, as I shall vpon the worst and most simplest person within this your Realme.

The king hearing this answere, was therewith maruellously reioyced in his minde, and said: My déere and welbeloued Sonne, with this answere thou hast deliuered mee of a great and ponderous agony: and I beséech thée, and vpon my blessing charge thée, that like as thou hast sayde, so thou minister iustice equally, and in no wise suffer not them that bee oppressed long to call vpon thée for iustice, but redresse oppressions, and indifferently and without delay, for no perswasion of flatterers, or of them that be partiall, or such as to haue their hands replenished with giftes, deferre not iustice till to morrow, if that thou mayest do iustice this day, least (peraduenture) God doe iustice on thée in the meane time, and take from thée thine authoritie: remember that the wealth of thy body, and thy soule, and of thy realme, resteth in the execution of iustice; and do not thy iustice so, that thou be called a Tyrant, but vse thy selfe meanely betwixt iustice and mercy in those thinges that belong to thée: And betwéene parties do iustice truely and extreamely, to the consolation of thy poore Subiectes that suffer iniuries, and to the punition of them that be extortioners and doers of oppressions, that other thereby may take example: and in thus doing, thou shalt obtaine the fauour of God, and the loue and feare of thy Subiectes, and therefore also thou shalt haue thy Realme more in tranquillitie and rest, which shall bee occasion of great prosperitie within thy Realme, which English men naturally do desire: for so long as they haue wealth and riches, so long shalt thou haue obeysance: and when they be poore, then they be alwayes ready at euery motion to make insurrections, and it causeth them to rebell against their Soueraigne Lorde: for the nature of them is such, rather to feare losing of their goodes and worldly substaunce, than the ieoparding of their liues. And if thou thus kéepe them in subiection mixed with loue and feare, thou shalt haue the most peaceable and fertile Countrey, and the most louing, faithfull, and manly people of the worlde, which shall bee cause of no small feare to thine aduersaries. My sonne, when it shall please God to call mée to the way ordred for euery worldly Creature, to thée (as my sonne and heire)

I muſt leaue my crowne and my Realme, which I aduiſe thée not to take vainely, and as a man elate in pride, and reioyced in worldly honour, but thinke that thou art more oppreſſed with charge, to purueie for euery perſon within the Realme, than exalted in vaine honour of the world. Thou ſhalt bee exalted vnto the crowne, for the wealth and conſeruation of the Realme, and not for thy ſingular commoditie and auaile: My ſonne, thou ſhalt bee a miniſter to thy Realme to kéepe it in tranquillitie and defend it. Like as the heart in the middeſt of the body is principall and chiefe thing in the body, and ſerueth to couet and deſire that thing that is moſt neceſſarie to euery of thy members, ſo (my ſonne) thou ſhalt bee amongſt thy people as chiefe and principall of them to miniſter, imagine and acquire thoſe things that may be moſt beneficiall for them. And then thy people ſhall be obedient to thée, to ayde and ſuccour thée, and in all things to accompliſh thy commaundements, like as thy members labour, euery one of them in their office, to acquire and get that thing that the heart deſireth, and as thy heart is of no force and impotent without the ayde of thy members, ſo without thy people, thy Raigne is nothing. My ſonne, thou ſhalt feare and dread God aboue all things, and thou ſhalt loue, honour and worſhip him with all thy heart, thou ſhalt attribute and aſcribe to him all things wherein thou ſéeſt thy ſelfe to bee well fortunate, be it victorie of thine enemies, loue of thy friends, obedience of thy ſubiects, ſtrength and actiuenéeſſe of body, honour, riches, or fruitfull generations, or any other thing whatſoeuer it be that chanceth to thy pleaſure. Thou ſhalt not imagine that any ſuch thing ſhould fortune to thée, by thine acte, nor by thy deſert, but thou ſhalt thinke that all commeth onely of the goodneſſe of the Lord. Thus thou ſhalt with all thine heart, prayſe, honour, and thanke God for all his benefites that he giueth vnto thée. And in thy ſelfe eſchew all vaineglorie and elation of heart, following the wholeſome counſell of the Pſalmiſt, which ſaieth, Non nobis Domine, non nobis, ſed nomini tuo da gloriam, which is to ſay, Not vnto vs Lord, not vnto vs, but to thy holy name be giuen laud and praiſe. Theſe and many other admoniſhments and doctrines this victorious King gaue vnto this Noble Prince his Sonne, who with effect followed the ſame, after the death of his father: whereby hee obtained grace of our Lorde to attaine to great victories and many glorious and incredible conqueſts, through the helpe and ſuccour of our Lord, whereof he was neuer deſtitute. The King his father drawing to his ende, after due thankes giuen, and ſupplications made to God, gaue his benediction to the Prince his ſonne, and ſo yéelded to God his ſpirit, the xx. of March, which was then midlent Sunday. Anno 1412. after the account of the Church of England, the yéere of his age 46. whē he had raigned 13. yéeres, ſixe moneths lacking 10. Dayes. His body was conueyed by water to Feuerſham, and from thence by land to Canterbury, and there buried by the Lady Mary his firſt wife, in the monaſtery of Chriſts Church, vnder a pillar in the North Ile. This King Henry, with Thomas Arundell Archbiſhop of Canterbury had béen great benefactors to this Church, in building a good part of the body

Issue of King Henrie.

King Henry the fift.

HEnry the fift borne at Monmouth, began his raigne the xx. day of March in the yére 1412. This Prince excéded the meane stature of men, he was beautifull of visage, his necke long, body slender and leane, and his bones small: neuertheless he was of marueilous great strength, and passing swift in running, insomuch that he with two other of his Lords, without hounds, bow, or other engine, would take a wilde bucke or Doe in a large parke: he studied at Oxford in the newe colledge, vnder the gouernment of Henry Bewfort his vncle on the fathers side, then Chauncellour of Oxford, after Bishop of Winchester: hee delighted in songs, meters, and musicall instruments, insomuch that in his Chappell amongst other his priuate prayers, he vsed our Lords prayer, certaine psalmes of Dauid, with diuers hymnes and canticles, all which I haue séene translated into heroicall English meter, by Iohn Lydgate Monke of Bury. He liued somewhat insolently, insomuch that whilest his father liued, being accompanied with some of his yong Lords and gentlemen, he would waite in disguised aray for his owne receiuers, and distresse them of their money: and sometimes at such enterprises both he and his company were surely beaten: and when his receiuers made to him their complaints how they were robbed in their comming vnto him, hee would giue them discharge of so much money as they had lost; and besides that, they should not depart from him without great rewards for their trouble and vexation, especially they should be rewarded that best had resisted him and his company, and of whom he had receiued the greatest and most strokes, and for example Sir Thomas Eliot writeth thus. The renowned Prince King Henry the fift, during the life of his father, was noted to be fierce, and of wanton courage. It hapned that one of his seruants, whom he fauored, was for felony by him committed, arraigned, at the kings bench, whereof the Prince being aduertised, and incensed by light persons about him, in furious rage came hastily to the bar, where his seruant stood as prisoner, and commaunded him to be vnguied and set at libertie, whereat all men were abashed, reserued the chiefe Iustice, who humbly exhorted the Prince to be ordered according to the ancient lawes of the Realme, or if he would haue him saued from the rigor of the lawes, that he should obtaine if he might of the King his father, his gracious pardon, whereby no law or iustice should be derogate. Ann.reg. 1. Titus Liuius. T. Eliots gouernour.

With

William Gascoigne was chiefe Justice of the kings bench, from the first of Henry the fourth, till the third of Henry the fift.

With the which answere the prince nothing appeased, but rather more inflamed, indeuoured himselfe to take away his seruant. The Iudge, considering the perillous example and inconuenience that might thereby ensue, with a valiant spirit & courage commaunded the prince vpon his allegeance to leaue the prisoner, and to departe his way: with which commaundement, the prince being set all in a furie, all chafed, and in a terrible maner came vp to the place of iudgment, men thinking that he would haue slaine the Iudge, or haue done to him some domage, but the Iudge sitting still, without mouing, declaring the maiestie of the Kings place of iudgment, and with an assured bold countenance, had to the prince these words following: Sir, remember your selfe, I kéepe here the place of the king your soueraigne lord and father, to whom you owe double obeisance, wherefore efsones in his name I charge you desist off your wilfulnes and vnlawfull enterprise, & from henceforth giue good example to those which hereafter shall be your proper subiects: and nowe for your contempt and disobedience, goe you to the prison of the kings bench, whereunto I commit you, and remaine you there prisoner vntill the pleasure of the king your father be further knowne. With which words, being abashed, and also wondering at the maruellous grauitie of that worshipfull Iustice, the prince laying his weapon aparte, doing reuerence, departed and went to the kings bench as he was commaunded. Whereat his seruants disdaining, came & shewed to the king all the whole affaire. Whereat hée a while studying, after, as a man all rauished with gladnes, holding his hands and eies towards heauen, abraid with a lowde voice: O mercifull God! how much am I bounde to thy infinite goodnes, especially for that thou hast giuen me a Iudge, who feareth not to minister iustice, and also a sonne, who can suffer semblably and obey iustice. Nowe (saith Thomas Eliot) here a man may behold three persons worthy memorye: first a Iudge, who being a subiect, feared not to execute iustice on the eldest sonne of his soueraigne Lord, and by the order of nature his successour. Also a prince, and sonne and heire of the K. in the middest of his folly, more considered his euill example, and the Iudges conscience in iustice, than his owne estate or wilfull appetite. Thirdly, a noble King and wise father, who contrary to the custome of parents, reioyced to sée his sonne, and the heire of his crowne, to be for his disobedience by his subiect corrected: wherefore I conclude, that nothing is more honorable or to be desired in a prince, or noble man, than placability, as contrariwise nothing is so detestable, or to be feared in such a one as wrath and cruel malignitie. Thus much of his youthfulnes: but after the decease of his father (as he that should succéed in the kingdome) he called to him a certaine monke of holy conuersation, to whom he confessed himselfe of all his offences, trespasses, and insolencies past, and after his counsaile in all things, at that time he reformed his life and manners, so that after his fathers decease was neuer no youth or wildnes that might haue place in him, but all his acts were sodainly changed into grauitie and discretion.

Titus Liuius.

realme, after three daies, offered to doe fealtie before hee was crowned or had solemnized his oth, well and iustly to gouerne the common weale, which offer, before was neuer found to be made to any prince of England.

The king gaue them al generally thankes, for their good mindes towardes him, and therewith exhorted them to the zeale of the publike prosperitie and honour of the realme. If any man had offended him he pardoned their trespas, and desired hartily of God, that if he should rule and doe all things well to the honour of God and the prosperous commoditie of the Realme, that then God would suffer him to be crowned: but if his fortune should be to do otherwise, that then God should take him to his mercie, and suffer him rather to be buried than to enterprise the charge of the Realme. 1413.

The ninth day of April he was crowned at Westminster, by Thomas Arundel archbishop of Canterburie, after which coronation, he called vnto him all those yong Lords & gentlemen that were the followers of his youg acts, to euery one of whom he gaue rich and bounteous gifts, and then commanded that as many as would change their manners as he intended to do should abide with him in his court, and to all that would perseuer in their former light conuersation, he gaue expresse commaundement vpon paine of their heads, neuer after that day to come in his presence.

Hauing auoyded those yong and suspicious company from his presence, he then attended to ghostly and worldly businesse. And first he commanded to edifie his royal manor that then was called Shéene (and now Richmount) he also founded two monasteries vpon the Thames (not far from the said manor royall) the one of the religion of the Cartusians, which he named Bethlem: the other of religious men and women, of S. Brigets order, and that he named Sion. In this house there were 60. sisters 13. priests 4. deacons and 8. laie brethrē, those neuer wore linnen but woollen, which two couents had but one church in commō, the nuns had their church aloft in the roofe, and the brethren beneath vpon the ground, eth couent seuerally inclosed, and after their profession, mought neuer come out, except by the Popes special licence: these ought to haue sufficient dowrie to sustaine them without begging, he indowed them with rents and reuenues taken from the priories aliens which hée suppressed. Richmond, Sheene, and Sion built.

He by the best aduisement he could, prouided, and ordeined in euery part of his Realme, Iudges, and other officers, such as he beleeued to be true and iust, and others that were knowne or suspect of couetousnes or partialitie, he clerely auoided from their former offices & romes. He also (as king Henrie his father had done) vsed for custome euerie day, when no state was kept, at after dinner, to haue a cushion layd on the cupboorde, and there to leane the space of an houre or more, to receiue bils, and heare complaints of whomsoeuer would come: & in those dayes if the king sate in the chamber, the steward of the household sate alway in the hal vnder the cloth of estate, the same being rolled vp aboue his head, and such knights sitting with him as at that time waited on the king. earth, whom king Henry the fourth had intumulate in the friers Church of Langley, and with due obseruance to be from thence translated to the Abbey of Westminster, where, after solemne exequies for him done, he was buried in Saint Peters Church in the said Abbey, on the south side of Saint Edwards shrine, by Quéene Anne his wife, as he himselfe in his life had desired, and had prepared his monument in the 18. yéere of his raigne. B. and Godfrey of Woodstréete goldsmiths, made the moulds & images of king Richard and Quéene Anne, laid on them, the charges of gilding of them excéeded 400. markes. King Henry founded perpetually one day euery wéeke, a memory to be celebrate for the said k. Richard, and vpon each day fiue shillings eight pence, to be giuen to the poore people, and once euery yéere vpon the day of his anniuerse 20. l. in pence to be dealt to the poore.

About this time Thomas Duke of Clarence, the kings brother, came from the coasts of Aquitaine, who (as we said before) was sent to ayde the Duke of Orliance against the Duke of Burgoyne.

A great part of the Citie of Norwich was brent sodainly with fire, with all the house of the friers preachers and all to them belonging, and also two friers of that house.

The same time the fauourers of Wicliffes doctrine, did naple vp scedules vpon the Church doores of London, which scedules contayned that there was an hundred thousand men ready to rise against al such as could not away with their sect, for indéed (saith Walsingham) they trusted to the force, power, and wit of a certaine knight called Iohn Olde-castell of Cowling in Kent, who for the honour of a marriage, which he had contracted with a kinswoman of a Nobleman, the Lord Cobham, obtayned the name of the said Lordship, or seignorie of Cobham: this Iohn was a strong man, and a méetely good man of war, but he was a most peruerse enemie to ỹ state of the Church at that time. In a synode therefore being holden at London, the said Sir Iohn Old-castell, for diuers points touching the sacrament, before the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Winchester and other, was conuict, and committed to the tower of London, out of the which he brake ouer the wals in the night, and escaped about the feast of Simon and Iude.

The King kéeping his Christmasse at his manor of Eltham (seuen miles from London) was warned that certaine had conspired against him, either to haue taken, or sodainly slaine him and his brethren on Twelfth day at night, whereupon the king sent word to the Maior of London, that he should arrest all suspitious persons: the Maior therefore caused euery Alderman in his warde to kéepe great watch, and about tenne of the clocke at night went himselfe with a strong power, to the signe of the Are without Bishops Gate, where they apprehended the man of the house called Iohn Burgate carpenter and seuen other, one of them being an Esquire belonging to Sir Iohn Old-castell, and sent them to Eltham, where they confessed fessed before the King that they were confederate with Sir Iohn Old-castell, to fight against him and his Lords in Saint Giles field above Holborne. On the morrowe after the Twelfth day, the King remoued priuily to Westminster, and because he had heard tell that the rude peoples intent was, if they did preuaile, first to destroy the monasteries of Westminster, Saint Albons, and Saint Pauls, and all the houses of friers in London: he minding to preuent such a mischiefe, contrary to the mindes of all that were about him, went into the fielde when it was little past midnight, with a great armie, for he was warned that Sir Iohn Old-castell, and Sir Roger Acton, would be in the same fielde on the next day following with 25000. people: and the same night were taken more then fourescore men in armor of the same faction, for many that came from far, not knowing the Kings campe to be in the field, were taken by the same and sent to prison, and being demanded whom they sought, made answere the Lord Cobham. The rumour of this, comming to the eares of the captaines that were the Kings enemies, they were wonderfully discouraged, and that the more, because none came to them out of London, from whence they loked for many thousands, whereupon they fled to saue themselues, and the Kings men following them toke some, and slew other, but where their captaine was become would not be knowne, notwithstanding that the King by proclamation promised to whomsoeuer could bring him forth a 1000. markes besides liberties to the Cities and townes that would disclose him, but there was not one found that would betray him, so greatly was he fauoured. Also the King being tolde of an ambushment gathered in Harengay parke, sent thither certaine Lords, who toke many, among whom, was one William Murle, a rich maultman, or bruer of Dunstaple, who had his two horses trapped with golde following him, and a paire of gilt spurs in his bosome, for he thought to haue bẽ made Knight on the morrow by the hands of Sir Iohn Old-castell. The xii. of January, 69. of them were condemned of treason at Westminster, and on the morrow after 37. of them were drawne from the Tower of London to Newgate, and so to Saint Giles, and there in a place called Fickets field, were all hanged, and seauen of them brent gallowes and al. The xix. of January, were drawne and hanged Sir Iohn Beuerley Priest, Iohn Burgate carpenter, a tert writer in Saint Iohns stréete, and a glouer on London Bridge, and shortly after, Sir Roger Acton Knight was taken, who on the tenth of Februarie, was drawne, hanged, and buried vnder the Gallowes.

Council of Constance abt. xt. may 5. of Nov.

Many men hanged, and some brent in Fickets field.

The twentith of February, deceased Thomas Arundel Archbishop of Canterbury. Henry Chicheley borne at Higham Ferries in Northampton shire succéeded, being translated from Saint Dauids in Wales.

The King taking compassion vpon Henry Percie a yong man (who by his grandfather Henry Percie Earle of Northumberland, was caried into Scotland, after the death of his father, who was slaine in the batttell of Shrewsburie, when this young man was then but a childe) commaunded them that were of his kindred, and néerest friends, to solicite for his reclaiming home againe out of Scotland, minding not onely to honour him by calling him home againe, but also to make him Earle of Northumberland.

King Henry kept his Lent in the Castle of Kenelworth, and caused an harber there to be planted in the marish, for his pleasure, amongst the thorns and bushes: where a fore had harbored, which fore he killed, being a thing then thought to prognosticate, that he should expell the craftie deceit of the French King, besides which also he there builded a most pleasant place, and caused it to bee termed Le pleasant maries, or the pleasant marsh. King Henry the 8. bestowed great cost in repairing Kenelworth Castle, caused the said banketting house to be taken downe, and part of it to be set vp in the base court at Killingworth. In this Lent season, whilest the King lay at Kenelworth, messengers came to him from the Dolphin of France named Charles, with a present of Paris balles, for him to play withall, but the King wrote to him, that he would shortly send to him London balles, with the which he would breake downe the roofes of houses.

King Henry, after that all dissentions and commotions in England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales were appeased, so that concord and vnitie were made and established in all parts of the Kings dominion, the King deliberated vpon the recouery of the Realme of Fraunce, which by iust title of inheritance was descended vnto him, and at that time was iniuriously withholden from him by the French King. And because he would nothing proceede against the pleasure of God, he first demaunded aduise, and counsell of all the discréte and learned men as well of the spiritualtie in both Vniuersities, as of the temporaltie through all his Realme, if he mought without offence to God lawfully recouer by armes his Realme of Fraunce. Who after long deliberation thereupon among them had, of one assent, made report vnto the King, that in so iust a quarrell he mought lawfully vse armes, if he might by none other wayes attaine his purpose, and right of inheritance: whereupon the King, in all things insuing the aduise of his Counsell, sent Ambassadors into France, there to demaund his right in the Counsell of the French, and if peraduenture they would deny to accomplish his desire, his Ambassadors should giue them knowledge that he would séeke his right by armes. These Ambassadors were honorably receiued in Fraunce, and for answere of their message there denounced, they brought with them nothing to report, except that within short time, the Frenchmen would send their Ambassadors into England, to declare their intent to the King of England vpon his demaund.

Shortly after arriued in England W. Bouratier Archbishop of Bourges, the Earle of Vandosme, Pierce Frennall Bishop of Liceur, the Lords Iuery, and of Braquimount, Walter Cole secretarie to the French King, Ambassadors of Fraunce, these were men of great authority: amongst them the Archbishop was the chiefe, who in like manner were héere receiued with great honor. At a time limited, the Archbishop of Bourges proposed their message, and in the ende, offered to the King lands, and a great sum of money with the daughter of the King their master in marriage, so that he would desist from that warre that he then intended to make in France. After which proposition and offer made, the Ambassadors dined with the King: and at another day limited, the King of England, by the mouth of the Archbishop of Canterbury made to them answere, to this effect: The proffers made, he said, were not sufficiendt recompence for the Kings rightfull inheritance in France, vniustly detained from him, wherefore for a finall answere, he would demand his right by force of armes in the best manner that he could, and that as briefly as to him were possible. Then the Archbishop of Bourges, after licence obtained, said: O King, with reuerence be it spoken, thinkest thou vniustly to depose the most Christian King of Fraunce? Thinkest thou that he hath offered to thee these lands and money, with his owne daughter to be thy wife, for any dread he hath of thee? nay not so, but the same our Lord, indued with pitie, as the louer of peace, hath made to thee this offer, to the intent, that innocent blood be not spilt and destroyed: and therefore by the aide of God, he shall at all times defend himselfe, his lands, and subiects, from thy vniust inuasions. And as to vs that be his Ambassadors, we desire thee, to make to vs safe conduct without domage through thy realme, and also that thou write to our soueraigne Lord, this thine answere entirely vnder thy seale, and signe manuell: which request the King granted vnto them, and they returned into Fraunce. Answere of the Bishop of Bourges.

In the moneth of May a Parliament was begun at Leicester, in the beginning whereof, there was a porter of the tower of London, drawen, hanged, and headed, whose head was sent to London, and set ouer the tower gate, for consenting to one that brake out of the tower, named Whitlocke. Parliament at Leicester. Porter of the Tower executed.

In this Parliament Iohn the Kings brother was made Duke of Bedford, Humfrey his brother Duke of Gloucester, and Richard brother to the Duke of Yorke was made Earle of Cambridge. The priories allians in England were giuen to the King, all their possessions to remaine to the King and to his heirs for euer, except land graunted to the colledge of Fodringhay, and after all these priories were suppressed to the number of more than one hundred houses. Gold waights were appointed. Priories suppressed to the number of 110.

In this Parliament were deuised diuers meanes to gather money of al the commons of England, therewith to sustaine the Kings wars, and to make prouision of all things necessarie for the same, the sum whereof, leuied and gathered of the spiritualtie and temporaltie amounted to the sum of 300. thousand markes English. And herewith order was taken to gather a great host of men through all the Kings dominions.

On Mary Magdalens day, in London, Iohn Nianser Esquire, with nine of his meu, set vpon and slue Iohn Tibbey clarke, Archdeacon of Huntington, and Chancellor to Quéene Ioane, late wife to Henry the fourth, for the which fact, the said Esquire, and foure of his men fled to S. Annes Church within Aldersgate, where they were mured vp with bord, and watched day and night till the 21. of August, on the which day, they forsware the land, and passed through the citie towards Calice in their shirts and breeches, each of them hauing a Crosse in his hand, and a purse about his necke, &c. The Queenes Chancellor slaine. Men forsware the land.

the second time out of Fraunce, declared to the king, that the Frenchmen did but vse fraud and deceits, wherefore the king being stirred vp vnto anger, and also knowing well the discord betwixt the great Lords of Fraunce, whereof hath somewhat been said before, determined to abate their scornings, and to teach them to vnderstand their folly, in awaking of a sleeping dog: and forthwith, the king commaunded all the prelates, and Nobles of the Realme, to come to London, there to intreate of waighty affaires concerning the Realme, at the which time, the Archbishop of Canterbury held a great councell, in the which were chosen certaine of the clergie of England, to goe to the generall Councell that should be holden at Constance, a citie of Germany, and so there were sent the Bishops of Salisburie, Bathe, and Hereford, and with them the Abbot of Westminster, and the Prior of Worcester, and many other wise men, in company of the Earle of Warwicke, whose presence did them much honour.

1415. Three schismaticall popes put downe.

In that councel was put downe three schismatical Popes, to wit, Balthasar Cossa late Pope, Iohn the 23. of that name: Peter de Luna, called Clement the 13. and Ægelus Corraris, called Gregory 12. which being done, one Otho Colombe a Noble Roman borne, was elected to the papacie, and was named Martin the fift.

Anno reg. 3.

In the meane space, the king like a prudent Prince thought good to take order for the resisting of the Scots, if according to their old maner, they should attempt any thing in his absence, and therefore he appointed the Earle of Westmerland, the Lord Scrope, the baron Greystocke, Sir Robert Vmfreuile, and diuers other valiant captaines to keepe the frontiers and marches of Scotland: which Sir Robert Vmfreuil on the day of Mary Magdalen, fought with the Scots at the towne of Gedering, hauing in his company only 300. archers, and 140. men of armes, where after a long conflict, he slue of his enimies 60. and od, and toke 360. prisoners, and put to flight 1000. and mo, whom he followed in chase aboue 12. miles, and so laden with prayes and prisoners, returned to the Castle of Rockesborough, whereof he was then captaine. When the king had gathered his navie together, appointed his archers, and men of armes, prepared his engins, and al things necessarie for the wars, he leauing behind him for gouernment of the Realme, the Quéene his mother in law, he commanded all that should goe with him, to be ready against the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist, and to méete him at Hampton.

The eighteenth day of June, king Henry with many Lords and others rode from London towards South-hampton, the Maior, Aldermen, and craftes of the Citie accompanying him on his way to the towne of Kingstone vpon Thames: whilest the king late at Southampton, where he abode for his retinue and stuffe longing to the wars, fastings, prayers vnto God, and almes dædes of the king, and other supplications of the clergie and commons had before, he mustered his vniuersall hoste vpon the sea bankes. In the which muster or view, on the last of Iulie was discouered a great and perilous conspiracie against him by three Lords, in whom of all the rest, hee put greatest trust and confidence, the chiefest of them was Henry Scrope, Lord treasurer: the second Richard Earle of Cambridge, brother to Edward Duke of Yorke, and Sir Thomas Grey, a Knight of the North, these had made Edmond Earle of March to sweare vpon a booke, not to disclose their counsell, and then tolde him that they thought to slay the King, and to make the sayde Edmond King, the which if hee refused to take vpon him, they would slay him: whereupon, the Earle prayed them to giue him one houres space to take aduisement what was best to doe, which being graunted, the Earle went secretly and tolde the King thereof, who caused them forthwith to bee apprehended, and brought before him, where they confessed the treason, for the which on the first of August they were arraigned in the Kings presence, and the same day all three beheaded. The Earle was buried heade and all, but the other heads were sent, the one to Yorke, the other to Newcastle vpon Tine, and there set vppe. It is to bee noted, that whatsoeuer hath béene reported of the confession of the Earle of Cambridge, certaine it is that hee was indighted by the name of Richard Earle of Cambridge of Conesburghe in the Countie of Yorke Knight, and with him Thomas Grey of Heton in the Countie of Northumberland Knight, for that they the twentieth day of Julie in the third yéere of King Henry the fift, at Southampton, and diuers other places within the Realme had conspired togither, with a power of men to them associate, without the Kings licence to haue led away the Lord Edmond Earle of March into Wales, and then to haue procured him to take vpon him the gouernment of the Realme, in case that King Richard the second were dead: and herewith had purposed to set forth a proclamation there in Wales, in the name of the saide Earle of March, as heire of the crowne, against King Henry by the name of Henry of Lancaster the vsurper, to the ende that by such meanes they mought drawe the more number of the Kings liege people vnto the sayd Earle. And further to haue conueyed a banner of the armes of England, and a certaine crowne of Spaine set vpon a pallet, and laid in gage to the sayde Earle of Cambridge, by the King togither with the said Earle of March into the parts of Wales aforesaide. And further that the said Earle of Cambridge, and Sir Thomas Gray had appointed certaine of the Kings liege people to repaire into Scotland, and to bring from thence, one Thomas Trumpington, also an other resembling in shape, fauour and countenance King Richard, and Henry Percy togethet with a great multitude of people to fight with the King, and him to destroy in open fielde: besides this, that they had meant to win certaine Castles in Wales, and to kéepe them against the King, and many other treasons they had contriued, as by the inditement was specified, to the ende they mought destroy the King and his brethren, the Dukes of Bedford, and of Gloucester, and other the great Lords and péeres of the Realme. And Henry Scrope of Washam of Flarflot, in the Countie of Yorke, was likewise indited, as consenting to the premisses, so that it appeareth their purpose was well enough then perceiued, although happely not much bruted abroade, for considerations thought necessarie to haue it kept husht.

Roger Wall. Titus Liuius.

King Henry hauing assembled his hoste at Southampton, as is afore said, to the intent to passe the seas, for conueyance of whom and of his victuals and artillery, were prouided and brought thither for his wages out of Holland and Zeland ships, hulkes, and other vessels to such a number, that his whole nauie at his departing from the land amounted to fiftéene hundred sailes.

King Henry sailed into Normandie.

On the xiii. of August the King toke shipping, and entred the sea, and on the xiiii. at night arriued at Kedicaur in Normandie, which is betwixte Hareflete and Humflete, of whose comming, all the Cities, and states of those parts being aduertised, were striken with great feare. The King, the Dukes of Clarence and of Glocester his brethren, the Duke of Yorke his vncle, the Earles, Barons, Knights, gentlemen, and Souldiers, cast their ankers there, and toke lande without any resistance, and the King forthwith falling to the ground vpon his knées deuoutly prayed to God that to his honor he would giue him iustice of his enemies. He had at his landing in his hoste fiue thousand speares, and xviii. thousand fotemen, besides gunners, and other engineers, artificers, and labourers, of whom the king had great abundance.

Titus Liuius

The King gaue to diuers gentlemen the order of knighthod, and assigned the bearing of his standards and banners to such men, as he knew to be of great strength and prowesse. All thing being set in good order and array, the King with all his hoste ascended to the top of an high hill there nigh, and there he rested the next day.

On the 16. day of August, the Duke of Clarence, leader of the forewarde in good ordinance, entred his iourney toward a towne called Hereflete, distant from Kedecaur scarcely three leagues, where he lodged his hoste in a field before the towne. The King at his comming, lodged himselfe nigh to the first warde, not farre from the towne in a plaine field. The Earle of Suffolke, Michaell at Poole, chiefetaine of the rereward, lodged on the other side before the Towne. Other Noble men that had the conduct of the two wings, lodged them, one on the right hand, the other on the left hand of the whole hoste.

Then the King commaunded to be proclaimed through the hoste, that vpon paine of death, all Churches should be kept inuiolate, vnspoiled and vnharmed, that no man should presume to take any vessell or ornament whatsoeuer from the Church, that they should not hurt any man of the church, whom they found without armour, nor any woman or childe, and then forthwith were sent to the towne, men of armes in great number, to sée the scituation thereof, who shortly returned with a great pray of cattell, and informed the King of all his demands.

Hyperant. Description of Hereflete.

Hereflete is the key of the sea of all Normandie, and is scituated vpon the sea side, by the riuer of Séene, betwixt two hils, and through the middle thereof runneth a riuer, which not farre from the same towne entreth into the Seane, and from thence, both those riuers in one descend into the sea, whereas a great and goodly hauen is, belonging to the same towne, which hauen is garnished with the defence of two faire and strong towers: and in the

the same hauen a right great naule of shippes may ride in safetie: and if the inhabitants of this towne inclose and keepe within the towne the course of the foresaid riuer by their sluces, as they may right well doe, then the riuer riseth without the towne so high, that it forecloseth all entries to the wals, so that no man may approach the towne on that part. This towne is also defended with high and thicke wals and towers, and is also enuironed with broad and deepe ditches. To this towne also belongeth onely two gates for entries, the one called Calturances, the other Postrouillier. In this towne, besides the inhabitants thereof, for the defence of the same, were fower hundred men of armes deputed in garrison, amongst whom were these Lords, Lord Discouteuile, cheefe captaine of the towne, Lord Blanuile, Lord Haqueuile, Lord Harmanuile, Lord Eancourt, Lord Gaillard Bos, and diuers other Lords and men expert in warre. These Lords caused their people to breake downe the causeway betwixt Pontkreuillers and Hereflete, to impaire and hinder the Englishmens passage. Neuertheless the Englishmen at their comming, by the good conduct of their King, were not so sore oppressed, by breaking of the causeway, but that they came so nigh as to lay their siege before the towne. When the King and all his host was come before the towne, all his tents and pauilions were set vp in the plaine field, wherewith that part of the towne was intirely inclosed: he also caused his great hall to be set vpon an hill, at the backe of his host, to serue as a Church, there to honor and serue God. This done the King commanding the Duke of Clarence to assege the towne, he endeuored to conuey his people ouer the riuer, in the passage whereof, he had a great skirmish with the inhabitants of the towne, but at the last his aduersaries being put to flight, recopled within the wals. The Duke conueyed ouer the riuer all his ward and companie, and because the riuer diuided the kings camp from the Dukes, they ordained a readie and sure passage ouer the same riuer betwixt both the camps, to the keeping whereof, certaine Gentlemen were appointed, so that their enemies might not endomage them neither by water nor land.

In this meane time befell a great misaduenture to the Frenchmen that were besieged, for the gun-powder and shot that was sent vnto them by the French King, was incountred vpon the sea by the Englishmen, and taken, to their great displeasure and domage. Enguerant.

The King gaue the charge of the fielde to his brother Humfrey Duke of Gloucester. On the same side the riuer that the King lay, was the Duke of Yorke, high Constable of England lodged with his band. When euery man was placed, the towne was so streightly assieged, that all entries and issues of the towne were stopped, so that they of the towne were in dispaire to haue any succour from the Realme of Fraunce. Many engins were raised by the English, which in short time should haue bin the destruction of the wals, if they of the towne had not the sooner stopped the riuer of the same towne within, whereby the water gathered and raised without the towne betwixt the King and the D. of Clarence, to the semblance of a little Titus Liuius sea, which caused the Englishmen to withdraw their guns, and other engins, whereby at that time the wals were saued. Then the King caused to be made vnder the water three great mines vnto the wals of the towne, which in like manner had béen the cause of their ruine, if the inhabitants had not countermined them, and letted their purpose. The inhabitants of the towne perceiuing themselues thus streightly assérged, as well by land as by sea, conueyed all their ships within their hauen, and bounde them together with chaines, and in the two towers that were made for the defence of the hauen, they put certaine garrisons, and armed men, who oftentimes attempted to inuade the Kings nauie, but at all times they were by his ships beaten, and constrained to recule still within their hauen: at the last, the captaines and inhabitants considering that by such skirmishes (as well vpon the land as vpon the sea) they gained nothing, toke this appointment with the King, that if they were not rescued by the Frenchmen within certaine dayes limited, they should then deliuer into his hands the towne, with thirtie persons of the greatest and most noble within the towne, such as the King would desire, to bee ordered at the Kings pleasure; and all the residue, as well men of warre, as the inhabitants of the same towne, without armour, and leauing behinde them their goods, should frélie goe where they would, for the suretie of which appointment to be kept, they deliuered vnto the King twelue of their greatest personages for pledges. The captaines and inhabitants of the towne séeing their day of appointment to approch, and themselues vtterly desperate of any succours of their people, ordained to performe their couenant at their day prefixed, which was the xvii. of September, on which day came Sir Lionell Braquemount, gouernour of the towne, vnto the King, and knéeling before him, said: Most victorious Prince, beholde héere the keyes of this towne, which after our promise I yélde vnto you, with the towne, my selfe, and my companie. Then were brought to the King the Lord Coteuile, the Lord Gangcourt, and other, to the number of thirtie, and all the residue, as well souldiers, as inhabitants, were suffered vnarmed to depart. When the gates of the towne were opened, and that the King approched vnto them, in purpose to enter the towne, he descended from his horse without the gate, and from thence, without hasen or shoes in great deuotion, he went immediatly to the Church of Saint Martin, Metropolitane of that towne, and there he made his prayers, and praised God his creator, for his good fortune: then hee commaunded to bee brought before him, all those Lords and gentlemen that were yélded to him for prisoners, whose names he caused to be put in writing, and vpon their othes to yélde themselues prisoners at Calice vpon Saint Martins day next following, and so they were deliuered out of the towne of Harflew, at the which day according to their appointment, they came to Calice, where they were receiued as prisoners, and after ransomed at great finances. After the deliuery of this towne, the foresaid two towers that defended the hauen, and resisted the Kings power ten dayes space, at the end whereof, because they were in despaire of succour, yélded them to the King, and all the souldiers and inhabitants both of the Towne and Towers were suffered to go freely vnarmed, whither they would. The king constitute Captaine of the Towne sir Thomas Beawford Earle of Dorset his vncle, to whom he also committed two thousand souldiers, chosen men of his host. Then considering that winter drew on, as also the losse of their men, by reason of the flix then raigning amongst them, by which infirmitie died Michaell at Poole, Earle of Suffolke, the Bishop of Norwich, the Lord Beawmont, and others, and of the commons, to the number of two thousand and aboue. King Henry created the sonne of Michaell at Poole, Earle of Suffolke, who liued not long after.

After king Henry had remained at Hareflet 15. daies, after the deliuery of the Towne, and of the Towers, he departed from thence towards Calice, whereof, when his enemies were aduertised, and also by what way he intended to passe, all the people of the countrey, Cities, and Townes were maruellously oppressed with feare, wherefore they hasted them to defensible places, and other that were apt to warre, toke them to their horses, and assembled them together in great number, with no small company of footemen, and in all that they might they oppressed the Englishmen. Titus Liuius

The kings host kept an easie pace, without making any haste, and when they approched the Towne of Ewe, their enemies assailed them in the fields with great force and noise, where on both parties it was foughten sore and vigorously: but the Frenchmen reculed to the Towne, where they were in good surety. From thence the king departed, and came to a passage of the riuer of Some, which the Frenchmen call Blankehelloke, or Blanchtache. This passage, at the comming vnto it was fired with sharpe stakes by their enemies, so that they coulde not passe there, but were constrayned to goe further, seeking their passage, vntill they came directly to haue the Citie of Amiens and the Castell of Gorby on their left side, where they of the said Citie beganne with them a newe fight: but they were soone forced by the English to returne to their Citie againe. The 19. of October the king passed the riuer of Some, at the passage of Vienna, and Bethew-court, and went then to lodge him at Mouche-legach, from whence, he aduanced him towards the riuer of Miramont. In the meane time, the French King and the Duke of Guyen his sonne, then Dolphin, purposing to resist the Englishmen, came to Roane, from whence, they sent three heraults to the King of England, to giue vnderstanding that hee should not escape without battaile: vnto whom the said King answered, All things be done at the pleasure of God, I will keepe the right way towardes Calcis: if our aduersaries doe attempt to disturbe vs in our iourney, we thinke they shall not doe it without their owne great daunger and perill. From thence, King Henry remoued to a village called Forceuile, aduancing his host towardes the riuer of Miramont, and the nert day they passed by the Chere, and the King lodged that night at Bonpers-lestaillon. The nert day the King remoued vnto Bangy. The nert day late in the night the King came to a village named Agencourt, Enguerant saith Masencelles, where they lodged not distant from the French host not aboue two hundred and fiftie paces. Enguerant. The Frenchmen fired their banners and standerts with the banner royall, whereof the Constable had the Conduct, in the field by them deuised and chosen, which was in the county of Saint Paule, in the ground of Agencourt, by which the day following, the Englishmen should passe to goe to Caleis.

The xxv. of October, after prayers and supplications of the king, his priests and people done with great deuotion, the king of England in the morning very early set forth his host in array: He commaunded that his horses and other carriages should be left in the village where he had lodged. The order of his field was thus: The middle battell whereof the king was conductor, was set in the midst of the field, directly against the middle battell of his aduersaries. On the right side was the first battell, and therewith the right wing: and on the left side the last battell, and the left wing. And these battels ioyning nigh together, by the prouidence of God, proued vnto this king a defensible place for his host, for the village wherein he was lodged before, defended his host from all inuasions on the backe, and the fielde wherein he was, was defended on both sides with two small riuers.

This Noble King was armed with sure and right beautifull armour: on his head a bright helmet, whereupon was set a Crowne of golde, repleate with pearle and precious stones, maruellous rich: In his shield he bare the armes both of England & Fraunce. And thus armed, hée was mounted vpon a goodly great horse, and after him were ledde certaine noble horses, with their bridles and trappers of Goldsmithes worke, and vpon them also were beaten the armes of England and of Fraunce. Thus this victorious king prepared to battaile, encouraged his people to the field that approched at hande.

The night before this cruell battell, by the aduise and counsell (as it is said) of the Duke of Yorke, the king had giuen commaundement through his host, that euery man should puruey him a stake sharpe at both endes, which the Englishmen fired in the ground before them in the field, to defend them from the oppression of horsemen. The Frenchmen had such confidence in the great multitude of their people, and in their great horses, that many of their great Princes and Lords leauing behinde them their souldiers, standerts and other ensignes, came towards the Englishmen in right great haste, as if they had béene assured of victory.

The King of England forthwith aduaunced his banners and standerts towards the French host, and he in person with his battayle in the same order wherein he stode, followed, exhorting and encouraging euery man to battell, notwithstanding he went to inuade his enemies, yet kept his accustomed order, that is, that the first battell went before, the second battell followed, and the third came immediately after, he commaunded his priests to abide in prayers, and diuine supplications, and his heraults in their coates of armes to attend to their offices. Then euery man fell prostrate to the round, and committing themselues to God, euery of them toke in his mouth a little péece of earth, in remembrance that they were mortall, and made of earth, as also in remembrance of the holy communion. Thus all their carriages and baggages left behinde, onely charged with their harneis, weapons, and stakes, they marched toward their enemies, with great brute and noyse. They sounded their trumpets, and stroke vp their drummes, which greatly incouraged the hearts of euery man. Their enemies seeing them approch, aduanced themselues also, and met them in the fielde, betwixt whom was begunne a marueilous fierce and cruell battell. The battell of the Englishmen was as long as the field wherein they fought, which was greatly to their aduantage, for by that their enemies were letted to come vpon them at the sides and backe of the hoste. The Frenchmen had ordayned their battels with two sharpe fronts, like vnto two hornes, which alwayes backeward was broader and broader: these sharpe battels set vpon the English middlewarde, intending to haue runne through the whole fielde, but the Frenchmen were slaine and wounded by the English Archers, and by the helpe of the stakes, which the Englishmen had fixed before them in the ground, whereby the horsemen were constrained to returne, or else to runne vpon the stakes, where many of them were ouerthrowne and wounded, and many both horses and men slaine. The battell and fight increased marueilously, by the space of three houres, in all which time no man was taken prisoner, but an innumerable number were slaine, vpon whose dead bodies they that followed were throwne and slaine.

Thus after a long and cruell battell, by the demerits of their great pride, there approched no man of the French to battell, but to death, of whom after that an innumerable company were slaine, and that the victory surely remayned to the Englishmen, they spared to slay, and toke prisoners of the French, both Princes and Gentlemen in great number. In this mortall battell, the Noble king of England neuer failed his men, for no danger of death, but fought with his enemies with an ardent heart, as a famished Lion for his pray, receiuing on his helmet and on the residue of his armour, many and great strokes.
